Facts and Comments

ONE of the urgent problems which must be solved by the exhibitor and the manufacturer is how to make picture exhibition pay during the summer months. The manufacturer is included because he can assist in the solution, although the exhibitor is the deciding agent. It will never do to evade the question, as many exhibitors do now, by closing their houses during the hot months; nor will it be wise to follow the foolish policy of being content, if expenses and receipts break even, or if the latter are only a few dollars behind. Exhibitors need scarcely be reminded that only a small percentage of the population in any city, town or village is away from home for any considerable time during the summer. The great majority of the people are at home the year round and depend on local attractions for entertainment. Amusement parks, nearby outdoor resorts, picnics, street carnivals, etc., enter into competition with the picture theater in the "dog days." They are favored either because of the varied diversion offered or for the expectation of greater comfort. That is it: the amusement seeker, in summer, wants a change of entertainment, if possible, and personal comfort, so that he may enjoy it. Can the picture theater be managed so that it can meet these demands successfully and hold the greater portion of its patronage in summer? The small store theater cannot be expected to do it, but the commodious, modernly appointed house should be able. Granted that the house is well ventilated and its atmosphere cooler than that outside it should be practical to offer a picture program that will outdraw any other entertainment offered. But the program must commend itself by being different in certain respects from the programs offered during autumn, winter and spring. The quality of the service must be higher, and there should be more subjects of a feature standard, including literary, educational and dramatic.

The reverse is the case at present. The exhibitor is inclined to pay as little as possible for his service and, in consequence, the subjects released by manufacturers during the summer, as a rule, do not include as many features as in the other seasons of the year. It is clear that if the exhibitor is willing to show the proper enterprise in doing his part, in order to secure a paying summer patronage, the manufacturer will furnish him with the necessary feature subjects that will bear all the publicity booming given them. The manufacturer, with his large expenditures, must be insured against heavy loss. It is high time, for self protection, that exhibitors began to reach out for this summer business, that lies within their reach. Owing to the surprising success of several large legitimate theaters throughout the country, which have presented picture programs this summer to overflowing audiences, at 25, 30 and 50 cents, it is to be expected that next summer will witness a great increase in their number. They will be competitors of regular exhibitors, who depend on picture programs all the year round. Regular exhibitors must, therefore, advance or fall to the rear. They must hold their patrons in the summer months, or take the chances of losing money and many of their patrons as well. Improved, and more enterprising, methods in management on the part of the exhibitor, and co-operation on the part of the manufacturer, in releasing the right type of film during the summer season, will go far toward solving satisfactorily the problem under discussion.

WITH the oft reiterated complaint of a lack of comedy fresh in our minds we cannot help wondering why the very obvious eccentricities of present feminine headgear, coiffures and wearing apparel generally have so far escaped the eagle eye of the film maker. Here is a legitimate field for the exploitation of a very harmless, but very amusing human foible. Parody and burlesque are much neglected in moving pictures, which is all the more remarkable, because the few attempts that have been successful have had great runs, for example the ridiculing of the Bowery melodrama by one of the prominent manufacturers. It would be easy to name offhand half a dozen well-known playwrights and comedians who owe their success and popularity very largely to clever parody and burlesque. Manufacturers of film please copy and profit thereby.

OUR Australian cousins are almost proverbially progressive. In many respects they march in the vanguard of civilization. We are glad to observe that the national spirit of enterprise manifests itself also in the moving picture field. The theaters there seem to be conducted on a high plane and the question of programs has received particular attention. We have seen a number of programs issued by some of the theaters in Sydney and have been struck by the fine typographical dress of the programs and the clever editing of the reading matter they contain. Some print advertisements, others do not, but all are far above the cheap variety of programs that in this country are used even by the more pretentious theatrical enterprises. Programs can be made a source of profit and prestige to every moving picture house if properly arranged. Some care must be taken and some money must be spent at first to introduce and popularize them. When this is done, however, there will be no lack of advertisers, who will buy enough space to pay for the printing and circulation. It should be remembered that experienced business men pay high prices to control the advertising privileges for the regular theatrical enterprises. This ought to be convincing proof that there is profit to be made. The public appreciate a neat, cleverly prepared program, and the exhibitor who gives them such a program will have an advantage over his rival who does not. Attention to details of this sort is often the secret of success.

THOSE who are in a state of transition are often the last to notice it. Great changes are impending in the realm of moving pictures. There is a general tendency in an upward direction, which no amount of indifference and carelessness on the part of certain film makers can wholly repress. New standards are constantly being set by magnificent feature films, which force a higher regard for art and beauty upon every man, who seeks to gain profit through the making of moving pictures. Those who do not see the higher standard or do not wish, or are unable, to follow it, are already doomed to failure. The success of extraordinary attractions in a number of reels will spur on others to special effort, and the ordinary moving picture, in order to keep pace at a winning distance, must improve in proportion. "Off with the old and on with the new" is a slogan that will rise in volume as the days go on.

It is always easier to fall than to rise. The moving picture industry started in an humble way and its early patronage was recruited from among the humblest classes of our population. Every step upward has been difficult just for that reason. The intelligent and educated classes, who are the molders of public opinion everywhere, refused to take the picture seriously. Gradually there came a change. The possibilities of the invention began to be recognized. This change has just begun and, were it not physically wrong to speak of a momentum in connection with things that rise, we should say it is gaining momentum every moment. It is but too true, however, that only downward movements get the aid of momentum; an up-hill fight depends on constant effort, and the moment the effort lags the results stop. For this reason the rise of the moving picture and of the men connected with it has been slow. It is sure, however, and going on every day.

THE more one reads the yellow newspapers of New York and other cities the clearer it becomes that some powerful agencies are needed to counteract the effect of some of this vile stuff on young and susceptible minds. A climax in yellow journalism was reached the other day, when one of the sheets announced that it had succeeded in obtaining "exclusively" the diary of a young, wayward girl, who is supposed to have led a young man to the crime of murder. How can the fathers and mothers of young girls let such abominations into their homes? What would happen to the moving picture exhibitor who should dare to thus debauch the morals of the young and shock the stomachs of normal human beings. One of the best correctives for this pestilent nuisance is the clean and decent moving picture. The moving picture is constantly moving upward while a large portion of the daily press seems to be rapidly traveling in the other direction.

A CONTRIBUTOR to an English contemporary suggests the founding of an "Institute of Kinematography," which is to consist of a committee of men, irreproachable as authorities on art, literature and drama, to whom could be submitted for approval, on payment, perhaps of a nominal entrance fee, any film that a maker intended to put on the market.

Further elaborating the idea, the writer goes on to say:

"If such an institute were properly conducted, it would not exist merely to condemn what was bad, but to recommend what was good—in the highest artistic sense. If, moreover, in cases of exceptionally high merit, this institute granted awards, certificates or diplomas, signed on behalf of a committee of leading artists, playwrights, authors and actors, their recommendation would not be without its value, and encouragement would thus be given to those makers of films who are even now (one is glad to say) doing their best to secure the worthiest productions, with plots that are well thought out, that are well-staged and acted by performers who are suited to and have carefully studied their various parts, so that the completed product shall be, in every sense, truly a work of art."

There is great merit in the plan undoubtedly, but until such an institute shall be in existence THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD will always be on hand to discharge the functions, which the writer would entrust to the "Institute of Kinematography."

THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD wishes to emphasize the fact that it invites and welcomes candid criticism from its readers. We are truly grateful for the kind commendations that come to us from so many quarters, but they do not blind us to the fact, that in a great and growing journal like this there must always be room for improvement. The best way to secure such improvement is to ask for plain, straightforward criticisms. We can never quite see ourselves as others see us and therefore would like to hear from those others. Every suggestion will be thankfully received and every complaint will receive the most friendly attention. This great industry has so many ramifications and is growing so rapidly in so many different directions, that the kindly or unkindly advice is a welcome aid. A man's real friends are they who tell him the plain unvarnished truth and we are always glad to get it from our readers.

Justice to the Film Makers.

By W. Stephen Bush.

THE only just and reasonable charge ever brought against the moving picture was the exploitation of crime as a special attraction. The mere portrayal of what we call crime could in itself never have been an offense, for ever since the stone age man has recorded crime as part of man's history. Because in the early history of the art, when there was no ethical or moral control of any kind, some film makers have sought to please in picture the vulgar elements, whom the newspapers seek to please in print, certain unfair and ignorant critics have always associated the moving picture with a high school for crime.

This slander today finds scant countenance among the intelligent and fair-minded portion of the community and while it is slowly dying out, we propose to call attention to a supreme and well-tested merit of the moving picture, to wit: Its absolute freedom from suggestiveness and immorality. In the last seven years probably not less than millions of pictures have been put before the public and the percentage of pictures offensive by reason of a taint of immorality is so small as to defy the computation of an expert accountant. In this respect, at least, the moving picture well sustains a comparison with the stage which, year after year, is defiled with prurient and indecent productions that have to be scourged back into the foul obscurity from which they emerged.

We are moved to make these remarks by reason of a letter recently addressed to the leading theatrical managers of the country by a body of clergymen. The letter files a protest against immorality in stage plays. It is only just to say that most managers have gone on record as well pleased with the object of the clergymen and promise to join in any effort to suppress the objectionable play.

It is to the lasting credit of the film makers that they have kept themselves absolutely clean from a contamination which is very real and, in this City of New York, has time and again threatened to overwhelm the stage. But recently the police had to interfere with a shameless play on Broadway and the mayor was forced to close the theater in which the production had found a home. On the other hand the moving picture has, in point of morals, been singularly clean. No sex problem has been attempted and what is still more to be commended, no "burlesque" in the vile sense of the word has ever been attempted. The so-called musical comedy, which is but a thinly veiled species of the more coarse and candid exhibition known as a "burlesque," has likewise been most wisely eschewed by the film maker. The moving picture audiences consist for the most part of what Lincoln used to delight in designating as "the plain people" and the plain people of this country have, ever since the foundation of the Republic and before, been thoroughly sound in morals. They would drive any indecent film from the screen and be forever after prejudiced against the maker.

How high and sensitive the regard of the modern American public (New York City emphatically excepted), is for the decencies of life, and how profound and sacred their esteem is for sound morality, was brought home to the writer the other day, when he sat in a library patiently wading through the voluminous works of Beaumont and Fletcher, two of the post-Elizabethan dramatists, second in English dramatic literature to Shakespeare alone, looking for some good dramatic or comic story that might be made useful to the film maker. The stories were, with scarcely one exception, well adapted for reproduction, but all suffered from one fatal defect: They treated the sexual question with what today would justly be considered a shocking lack of decency and discretion.

The modern trend in the world of thought and morals is distinctly upward and the moving picture has caught its full share of that admirable spirit, in fact more than its full share, because the modern stage in that respect is far behind the picture.

Beware of M. P. Camera Men.

NEW uses for the moving picture are found constantly, almost as often as the earth turns round. The bakers of this city, or some large portion of them, have gone on strike against their employers. To win public opinion to their side the bakers intend to have moving pictures made of a large bakery in operation, showing the present unsanitary conditions, which, according to the claim of the strikers, could be much improved by a more humane regulation of working hours.

This shows that the public have absolute confidence in the moving picture as an accurate and truth-telling reporter. It shows, too, that in all classes of our population men begin to think about the moving picture and give it most serious consideration.

A daily paper, speaking of possible new "sociological" uses of the moving picture in connection with the bakers' strike, dwells on the educational possibilities of the picture as recently outlined by Mr. Edison. It remarks "that children would be undeniably interested in such a novel method of learning a lesson. There would be no tedium connected with this phase of the day's work."

Need the M. P. camera man confine himself to the master bakers, when it comes to pictorial disclosure of all kinds of bad things? Indeed not. The camera man must possess equal terrors for the corrupt politician, who could never know at what moment the whole of his transaction with a railroad lobbyist will be recorded for use on the screen in the next political campaign, and such affairs as the late "House of Mirth" in Albany and the happenings therein would draw crowded houses everywhere, if filmed at the right moment.

Political parties at no distant date may each have their corps of camera men ready to descend upon the filmable misdeeds of their adversaries and the level of political morality would no doubt be raised. A moving picture of the late District Attorney Jerome shaking dice with the sons of Thomas F. Ryan would have warranted an extra charge anywhere as a highly humorous incident, even after it had outlived its usefulness as a campaign document. We could multiply instances ad infinitum, but suffice it to say:

"The moving picture camera man will get you, if you don't watch out."

Giving Musical Expression to the Drama.

By W. Stephen Bush.

The Moving Picture World's musical department, edited as it is in so able and conscientious a manner, has surely been the source of much profitable inspiration to the very important person who takes care of the music in the moving picture theatre. Its high tone and ceaseless striving for improvement has inspired the present article.

Every man or woman in charge of the music of a moving picture theatre is, consciously or unconsciously, a disciple or follower of Richard Wagner. What has been the object of Wagner's most typical music? Nothing more or less than "giving musical expression to the drama." Let us look carefully at the words in quotation marks. Strictly speaking, the modern school before Wagner (to distinguish it from the music of the ancient Greeks) did not as its primary object seek to give "musical expression to the drama," but subordinated the drama to the music and the libretto became more or less of an excuse for clever orchestration. It was very much like subordinating the clothes to the man or sacrificing the substance for the sake of the shadow. As a result we have some of the finest operas, supported by librettos that border on the idiotic.. I will only instance Mozart's "Magic Flute." It is a veritable treasure house of the melody of genius, but the libretto is nothing more than a lot of Masonic ritualistic jumble, perfectly unintelligible to the great mass of the public. It is quite true that you find in some of the great pre-Wagnerian masters attempts within the limits of narrow and technical rules to give musical expression to the drama, Gluck being perhaps the most notable example. On the whole, however, music was held captive in a house of bondage, watched and guarded by rule-ridden fanatics. Wagner shows us a somewhat exaggerated but by no means unlikely type of these technique-bound musicians and composers in the person of Hans Sachs in the "Meistersinger."

Nothing was or could be good unless it bore the stamp of approval by the master of the musical guild, which attempted to exercise a sort of censorship.

Wagner with the boldness of genius cracked the old molds and once more gave back to music its noblest function, which must always be that of "giving musical expression to the drama."

In his well-known booklet, "The Perfect Wagnerite," George Bernard Shaw speaks of the marvels of the music-drama in the "Ring of the Nibelung," and makes a powerful plea for Wagnerian freedom of music, unwittingly giving most valuable advice to the conscientious pianist of the moving picture theatre. He says in his usual clear and familiar style:

"There is not a single bar of classical music in the "Ring" (of the Nibelung), not a note in it that has any other point than the single direct point of giving musical expression to the drama. In classical programs there are, as the analytical programs tell us, first subjects and second subjects, free fantasies, recapitulations and codas; then there are fugues with counter-subjects, strettos and pedal points; there are passacaglias and ground basses, canons and hypodiapente and other ingenuities, which have after all stood or fallen by their prettiness as much as the simplest folk-tune. Wagner is never driving at anything of this sort, any more than Shakespeare in his plays drives at such ingenuities of versemaking as sonnets and triolets and the like, and this is why he is so easy for the natural musician who has had no academic teaching. * * * The unskilled, untaught musician may approach Wagner boldly, for there is no possibility of a misunderstanding between them; the 'Ring' music is perfectly single and simple."

It would be well if the pianist in the photoplay house gave this quotation from Shaw a little careful thought. Scattered in great profusion throughout the "Ring of the Nibelung," and in fact throughout every one of Wagner's operas from "Lohengrin" to "Parsifal," will be found a number of central and leading "motifs," which are easily susceptible of variation and adaptation, and as they range in the register of human or rather dramatic emotions from joy to sorrow and back again through the finest shadings, it is plain that the development of such a theme in connection with almost any drama of the silent stage offers new and wonderful opportunities for splendid moving picture music. It is a subject which should interest every man and woman who "is working up the pictures," or translated into English is trying to "give musical expression to the drama."

Even a little consideration of the matter will bring us to a very interesting discovery, to-wit: that Wagner's music-dramas could be adapted for the moving picture theatre without synchronization in the strictest sense of the word, but this is a topic which well deserves to be treated separately and to which more space will be devoted in a future issue.

The Coming Enfranchisement of the Moving Picture.

By W. Stephen Bush.

THE discrimination of the law between the moving picture exhibitor and the newspaper is an absolute injustice. Any man, as our laws stand today, with enough money to buy the needful type and hire the needful help can publish a newspaper and there is no censorship, no license, no attempt of control by the State. He may devote the columns of his paper both in print or picture to the delineation of crime and the description of moral cesspools and the invasion of privacy and no one may call him to account except through long and wearisome proceedings at law. It is urged that the freedom of the press is "the bulwark of our liberties." Then why not extend this same liberty to the moving picture, which pursues in a more effective manner precisely those objects, for which the press is assumed to work; enlightenment, education, amusement and information? Every man according to the constitution is free to write and publish what he chooses, being responsible for the abuse of such freedom only. Why assume that the newspaper publisher, who works with types, is far less likely to abuse his privilege than the moving picture exhibitor, who works with moving pictures?

It is entirely just and proper to war against the realism of crime in moving pictures. The war has been carried on so successfully, aided in no small measure by The Moving Picture World, that the crime film has become a thing of the past. Then why are the newspapers allowed to indulge in printed and pictorial description of crime and scandal while the strictest control is maintained over the moving picture?

There is no sensible and satisfying answer to the question, but there is an explanation, which must be interesting to the friends of the moving picture.

It took centuries after the invention of printing before the press was enfranchised. Men in the course of time realized more and more with each generation the inestimable value of the movable type as an agent for the highest purposes in civilization. In consequence the printed type began to be a favorite of legislation, the printer and publisher were surrounded with many immunities, which were denied to the ordinary citizen. It was felt that knowledge being the highest good in this world the agency for spreading and increasing knowledge was entitled to the greatest consideration at the hands of the law-givers and thus grew up what we today so proudly call the freedom of the press.

The moving picture as an agency for spreading and increasing human knowledge is entitled to the same consideration. If the press can be trusted to take care of itself why not the picture?

We expect to see the full enfranchisement of the moving picture in the near future, when it will be freed from the trammels of licenses and censorships and all kinds of unreasonable and antiquated regulations and restrictions. If it took the press centuries to come into its own, the moving picture will attain its enfranchisement in decades. Its manifold usefulness for mankind is so obviously great and growing greater every day, that before long the law, instead of watching it with suspicion as it does now, will give it all the aid and facilities, which come with freedom and which will make possible still wider fields of helpfulness.

FOREIGN NOTES OF INTEREST.

It seems in the interior of Germany the country schoolmasters are the censors ex-officio of the moving pictures. Of course there are many Dogberrys among them and they just love to show what a man "clothed with a little brief authority" can do in the way of making an ass of himself.

The old sage that remarked that the members of the human family were as much alike as a brood of chickens is once more entitled to score. Read this little item from Turkey.

A correspondent of a German paper writes that Turkish audiences resemble in many respects those in other parts of the world. The other night he arrived at a kinema show about half-past nine, but found he was much too early. Soon after ten, however, the better class public began to arrive. During the evening, unfortunately, the electric light failed, and they were plunged in darkness. Then commenced such a knocking of sticks and stamping of feet as never was heard. Cat-calls, barking and shouting turned the place into a perfect pandemonium, in which local students played a prominent part. It was some time before order was restored, and the theater eventually cleared. Truly these are times when even the sluggish Turk is roused from his proverbially sluggish torpors, and this apparently was one of them.

The greatest care should be exercised in taking films through Italy. A panic seems to have overtaken the railway officials, and it is said that should any films be found among travelers' luggage, in spite of their being in metal cases, they are immediately confiscated and a fine of 58 frs. imposed upon the person in charge of the goods.

A foreign trade paper tells the following clever story: "A well-known actor on leaving the theater after the evening's performance, placed a dime in the hand of an apparently blind man standing at the corner of the street. The coin was just saved from falling to the ground by the mendicant's skillful manipulation of his hat. "Why, you're not blind," said the actor scornfully. "No, sir," confessed the beggar; "I am taking a friend's place while he is having a bit of a rest. But he's blind, sir, been blind from birth." "And where is he taking his rest?" demanded the benevolent player. "Well, sir, the fact is," was the hesitating reply, "he's heard so much about these animated picture shows that he's taken a night off to go and see one of them."

The popularity of American films in every part of Europe is on the increase. In England, France, Germany, it is by no means only the Western and Indian stories that are eagerly looked for by moving picture patrons, but American films of general dramatic, or historic, or scenic, or educational are always sure of a warm welcome. This is a sincere tribute to the present condition of the industry in this country and the best justification of the policy of higher ideals and unceasing progress in the right direction.

Punk Plays.

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

WHO shall say what they are? Tell a producer that he is doing well while all other houses seem indifferent to quality, and he will manifest a form of regretful silence more pathetically eloquent than all the words in the Century Dictionary can express, or he may tell you confidentially:

"It is sad that all the others are falling behind, but WE are advancing with rapid strides—letters from exhibitors all over the country prove this conclusively—have you seen our last release?"

What's the use? Self-exploitation is a matter of business, even playwrights are attacked by a mild form of the disease (judging from a recent financial exhibit published in these columns); the critic is regarded as an ostentatious and inexperienced individual who really injures the business unless he shovels out indiscriminate praise. The cause of sensitiveness to open discussion of the merits of photo-plays is easily traceable to universal human egoism, hardened in many, who are turning out several reels a week into a form of impenetrable vanity by the constant flattery of those interested in holding down the jobs.

Who shall stand forth and proclaim the truth?

The ordinary public has mighty little to say on this subject, but the intelligent portion of our people is only partially attracted by the picture shows and many who were enthusiasts a year ago are growing weary of the tiresome strumming of a few stale old tunes. I have yet to enjoy the acquaintance of producers who go regularly to the shows, and, aside from actors who attend when their faces are shown on the screen, comparatively few employees of reel factories patronize this form of entertainment. Men like Mr. Griffith, Mr. Blackton, Mr. Porter, or Mr. Saltor, could undoubtedly contribute much valuable information on this subject, but their messages to the world are sent out in the pictures they produce; they are less men of words than of deeds. There are outside playwrights who could add to our general fund of knowledge in regard to what best suits the public—they are especially qualified by hard experience and enforced observation to pass judgment on plays—but they are refused the public recognition accorded to writers of dramatic stories in all other fields and their utterances might, on that account, lack the weight of authority usually associated with an established reputation. Inside playwrights, those holding salaried positions, scenario editors, adapters, actors, directors' sisters, and all others within the magic circle of "influence," are untried quantities—many of them would not be able to make carfare as free lances. If their product was a spontaneous flow of original material of a quality high enough to command a price in the open market, very few of them would be watching for the pay envelope and enduring the precarious uncertainty attached to indiscriminate pilfering.

It appears to one who has gone the rounds with his eyes open that at least one weak spot in moving picture production is the fierce economy exercised in what might be termed the initial department. I have heard from this or that complacent shockhead that not two per cent. of the scenarios submitted are really worthy of examination—a stock phrase used in self-elevation and curiously inconsistent—whereas many of those who are delegated to exercise selective taste have about the same qualifications for discriminating among the mass of plays submitted that a hod carrier has for choosing the design of a house. I do not see how this matter is to be remedied unless the men of brains in each business organization give their personal attention to this department, but I can see that the right sort of encouragement given to outside contributors might lead to an improvement of the product.

It is not necessary to give each new and promising scenario a trial, but the writers of them, especially late arrivals in the field, could easily be encouraged to further effort with a small payment on account and a promise of increased remuneration if future contributions prove satisfactory. To refuse practically all the scenarios submitted is to stop up or choke a natural source of supply. If a majority of a careful author's scenarios are deemed unavailable though purchased, even if only one in four proves worthy of elaborate presentation, dividends would continue, would be as unaffected as the Croton Water System by what it contributes to a few ice cream sodas.

It is all right to re-immortalize the poets and novelists, especially those of expired copyright, and to present historical periods with a Johnny-loves-Mary episode interwoven to help along our feeble understanding, but the great cry is for subjects of to-day in bright, original, and entertaining form. To the hack writers can be given the demoralizing occupation of presenting what never-has-been for the edification of those who never-will-be, but the public hungers for what is new, refreshing, invigorating, or charming, in accordance with the tastes of these times.

Just by way of example, there is a limitless amount of fun in a farce-comedy—it even makes the critics funny. Recent comment on a farce-comedy was pointed out to me in which the writer admitted that a play of this kind he had seen was brightly presented and pleased the audience, "but," the critic added, "it could never have occurred." Farce-comedy has no limitations; it reaches out into the future and invades other spheres; it is surest to receive appreciation when directed at present-day weaknesses—this is the first time it has ever been regarded as an exponent of the truth.

In all other forms of the drama I would voice a plea for naturalness. There is entirely too much artificiality in most photoplays, too much straining for theatrical effect. This is allowable in some cases, as in the rapid evolution of a strong character, but we are too much repelled by morbid and sensational situations. "Give us a new situation," the old-timers say. "Give us a true situation," is the public demand.

The panorama of existence as spread out before us is replete with incident of humorous, pathetic, or thrilling character. It is a ceaseless conflict, just as big as though depicted by nice, clean soldiers on dirty battlefields in the photoplays. If these playlets are to ring true they must be consistent even in tiny details. No fat "two-gun" men—those cow-pony riders are as lean as an author's earnings; no big-armed white men impersonating red ones—the true American Indian never did a day's work in his life; no Colonial chambers fitted with castaways from the auction room; no gentlemen in the country with silk hats—only actors and drummers wear them out of the city; no evening dress villains drawing attention to their feet with white spats, though spats are very dear to the actor's heart; no American girls made ridiculous with ill-fitting garments from the costumer or wardrobe room—they are the best-dressed women in the world and bear no resemblance to the chalk-faced soubrettes of Lobster Square. Most of us prefer stories of human life as we see it.

Reviews of Notable Films

THE BLIND PRINCESS AND THE POET (Biograph).

THRICE welcome in these days of monotony is the film that defies classification. None of the stale molds of "photoplay" or "comedy" or "scenic" or "educational" can express the lofty purpose, the sublime allegory, the superb scenery, the deep lesson, the hundred and one lesser charms of this reel, which is surpassed by none and equalled only by "Pippa Passes." It greatly resembles "Pippa Passes" in its conception and as the scene is laid in some wonderful gardens, over which is poured the crystal flood of California's light, it possesses one charm all and singularly its own. Like "Pippa Passes," it enlarges the boundary of moving picture possibilities and shows in an agreeably convincing manner that there are spheres for the film maker very much above the hackneyed photoplay. A tribute is due at the outset to the genius of the producer capable of conceiving and impressibly yet simply carrying out the idea which forms the basis of the film. "The Lords Gold"—I borrow the words from the story of the titles—"Selfish, Folly, Presumption" have no power to heal, but the simple kiss of unselfish love brings back to the blind princess all the glowing glories of the sky. Such is the sum and substance of the moral, underlying this most sweet and original allegory, but what a compelling power in the pictures, and how easily they tell the story.

Lofty as was the conception, it would never have left the producer's brain and stolen its insinuating way into the hearts of all who see it without the co-operation of the players. This co-operation was conscientious and thorough in the minutest particular. Of the thousand feet of film, not the fraction of an inch has been wasted; it is to the ordinary reel what the essence of ottar of roses is to its thousandth dilution.

It is given to but very few to play so skillfully on heart and mind, to touch a hundred chords at one touch and to mingle with so much outward splendor a tale of the inward beauty of the human soul.

We see the Lords Gold, Selfish, Folly and Presumption" but a few moments, but in these few moments, with no effort but with most pleasurable sensations we realize what the figures represent; they need scarcely have been indicated in the title. "John Selfish slays the poet's only friend, The Child Equality"—thus runs the title of a scene scarcely two minutes long, but how sharply the idea on the screen strikes into even the humblest intelligence. Take again the characterization of the poet—two or three strokes and we know as much as we can learn by reading the philosophy of poetry, and thus a vein of encyclopedic power runs all through the reel—a power most rarely found even in literature and quite unique in the history of moving pictures.

To place this picture on the screen along with the ordinary products seems wrong; something more is due to it; it deserves to be well advertised, well featured in every possible way, for it is extraordinary in quality and outweighs a hundred common photoplays.

THE DEATH OF EDWARD III (Vitagraph).

THIS meritorious film by the Vitagraph is destined to occupy a high place among moving pictures. History has not been searched in vain to procure an incident in which Mr. Charles Kent is able to display his histrionic ability; his portrayal of the illness and tragic death of King Edward the Third, will without doubt rank as a masterpiece. Besides filling its appointed place in an exhibition of first class pictures, its historical setting and importance places it among the best of those films which have educational value, and halls of learning will see this picture as often if not oftener than the photoplay theater. It will also prove valuable as an illustration of good acting for many a student with histrionic aspirations, as few characters require that thorough artistic conception which this presentation of the King commands. The vigor of the dying monarch in asserting his authority once again, is a surprise to his insolent attendants, who see a revival of his former power and are obedient to his behests. The coming of his paramour gives for the time being a new hope that he has not been entirely deserted, his former "Queen of Beauty" assuring him of her continued love and faithfulness persuades him to take a soothing potion which he had refused at his doctor's hands.

Believing him to be in the sleep of death, the true duplicity of her character is shown as she stealthily removes from the King's hands his costly rings, and especially his signet ring. Other attendants entering discover this her perfidy and excuse themselves thereby in looting and despoiling the royal apartment. Upon awaking, the King, finding himself so thoroughly betrayed and despoiled, filled with the power of great rage, attempts to cross the room, only to sink back again in weakness and despair as he bemoans this natural result of his sins.

Although forsaken by all, there enters at this moment a young priest bearing a cross, the sight of which is a comfort to the prostrate King, who stretches forth his weak hands and with a sigh of relief embraces it, falling back dead with the emblem of his faith on his breast. The story is wonderfully told, and the interest is held for every thought so graphically portrayed; not only will lovers of the play or pictures see and be satisfied with this production, but the student will welcome and praise it. It is to be hoped that this is but one of many of what will surely prove a most valuable series.

SPECIAL MESSENGER (Kalem).

THE Kalem Company has for some time past issued a number of pictures, dealing with incidents in the Civil War. These pictures were all taken in the South, often on or near the very theater of war. They give credit to the bravery and the indomitable spirit of the South and for that reason are welcome North and South, more welcome even in the North, were such a thing possible, for the gallantry of the Southern armies is justly looked upon as a national glory, to be shared in by all sections. In this way the Kalem pictures have a splendid educational value, as they help the newer generations forget the bitterness and only remember the common glories of that heroic epoch.

Scene from "Special Messenger" (Kalem).

The present picture, while its simple story is based on a historic incident, derives its chief merit from the extraordinary horsemanship of its principal character. To a man with red blood—and no less to a woman—there is something indescribably charming in clever horsemanship. I do not speak of the horsemanship of the circus or the exhibition of the trick rider, which are good enough in their way, but of that skilled and graceful handling of a horse out in the open on a field of battle or over hedge and hurdle following the hounds, or in a thrilling pursuit. Of the latter class of horsemanship this picture gives the finest example I have seen, and I have seen many very clever ones in some of the Essanay and Selig pictures. The "Special Messenger" before the pursuit handles his mount with a gentle mastery, most pleasant to look at. It is only when he is pursucd, however, that he shows how thorough that mastery is and how it can afford to scoff at any danger. He sees his pursuers through a spy-glass and at once he bends into a position of safety, crouching over the horse's flanks, horse and rider seeming like one. The pursuers cut off his escape over a bridge, but gathering himself in a swift second for a supreme effort the rider plunges from a height of twenty-five feet into the rushing river below and, amid a veritable hail of bullets, steers his horse through the current and gains the shore.

Scene from "Special Messenger" (Kalem).

Apparently none the worse for his hardy feat, he faces pursuit once more, for the enraged Federal cavalrymen have ridden around the bridge and are gaining on him. As resourceful as he is daring, the rider grasps the branch of a tree and hides amid the foliage of the twigs, thus successfully eluding his pursuers. He reaches his own home not far away and is there hidden by the brave wife and the aged servant in an old manger that had been in disuse for some time. The wife with rare presence of mind fills the crib with hay and brings a horse to feed on it. When the pursuers come they overlook the very unusual hiding-place and the daring soldier, who had been badly wounded in the pursuit, is safe at last. The adventure of the husband ended, that of the wife now begins. The brave little woman sets out to deliver the message and is captured. How she succeeds in deceiving the Federal officers is best told in the story, but it is an exceedingly clever device, which keeps the spectator in suspense to the last moment.

THE PATHE JOURNAL (Pathe).

IT would be difficult indeed to overestimate the importance of this new feature in moving pictures, which will be sent out to American exhibitors for the first time on August the 8th. The confusion of tongues begun at the Tower of Babel bids fair to be undone by this new institution. It will bring the continents and nations together and work for a better understanding of one people by another. To that extent it will do missionary work for civilization of incalculable value.

The Pathe Journal makes its debut with a mixed program of foreign and domestic events. The foreign events consist of happenings in England, France, Russia and Germany. We see the scenes and display of military splendor at the unveiling of the monument to Queen Victoria in London; the presentation of the colors to a regiment of French Zouaves at the Hotel des Invalides, in Paris; the visit of the German crown prince and his wife in St. Petersburg; the highly interesting water jousts at Nizza, France, and a big military review of the German troops at Potsdam. Of all the foreign features the last named is easily the most impressive. No amount of printed or spoken description could give us a clear and convincing picture of Germany in arms, as this film. For the first time we understand what is meant by the military prowess of Germany and the splendid physique and perfect drill and discipline of its soldiers.

Of American events, the most notable were the man-of-war "North Dakota" lying at the dock in the Brooklyn Navy Yard, undergoing needed repairs; the annual horseshow at Long Branch and the Regatta at Saratoga Lake. All were fine and interesting, but the last named, showing as it does a great sporting event at the queen of American water resorts, was particularly attractive.

It is reasonable to expect that this unique feature, which in time will be developed to its fullest possible capacity, will prove of lasting value to the exhibitor. All preparations have been made by the Pathes to cover the entire country as thoroughly as the Associated Press covers it today. Who would not take in the news of the world "just as it really happened" as part of the regular picture entertainment?

AS A BOY DREAMS (Imp).

The predilection of the small boy to read stories of adventure is made the theme of a very enjoyable film that will be released shortly by the Imp concern. The fondest, wildest dreams of the boy are realized, but alas, it is only a dream, and the youth awakes to the stern reality that his father is a hard taskmaster. The story is that of a lad who dreams of experiences at sea, in which pirates, a pretty girl, treasure chests and hair-breadth escapes figure prominently. It is a clever conception of the fancies of the small boy and the rude realization that it is not real furnishes a comedy tinge that makes it enjoyable. The story is carefully staged, with the true nautical coloring and settings, and will prove interesting to both old and young.

OUT OF THE DARKNESS (Reliance).

Commendable especially for its good photographic effects is the Reliance subject of the above mentioned title. While the general tone of the picture throughout is good, some of the scenes are of surpassing excellence and reflect great credit upon the manufacturing department of the Reliance Company. The story is not great, but it carries a lesson that is set forth plainly and logically by the players who have carried their respective parts in an intelligent and convincing manner. Bert Mason is a young New York lawyer just springing into prominence; he is in love with Ruth, presumably a girl of the old home town, for the first scene shows the young man upon a visit to his fiancee and sees him depart for the city. Plunging into the toil of a great case, the young lawyer has barely time to write a few lines to his sweetheart to promise a long letter when the case is finished. But time passes and the letter is not written and the girl is alone with her sorrows and her invalid father.

What is happening with the young lawyer is shown in some excellent scenes wherein he is seen to be enjoying the social amenities of the great city. In the course of events he meets and becomes enamored of a beautiful woman, who exerts her charms to fascinate him. This arouses the jealousy of a rival lover who finally shoots the young lawyer when he finds that he has been supplanted in the siren's favor. The bullet does not kill, but it threatens to cost the young lawyer his eyesight and he goes to the hospital for treatment.

Back in the home town the news comes to the girl as a great shock. She has heard nothing from her lover in some time; her father has died and she is quite alone, but for the hope that the recreant lover would come to her. With the information that he has been shot while in the company of a woman by his rival, Ruth determines to go to him. A letter of introduction to the city doctor in charge from her old family doctor gains admission to the patient's room. Days of patient nursing follow until an operation has been performed; then the bandages are removed and it is found that sight has been saved to the young man. At first, in his gratitude to the surgeon for saving his sight, the young lawyer does not see his little sweetheart, but once his eyes rest upon her there is no hesitation and a happy reconciliation concludes the picture.

FOREIGN NOTES OF INTEREST.

The plans for the production of a film of the Siege of Sebastopol have met with the heartiest approval of the Czar, who has signified his intention of being present at the taking. Acording to the reports from Moscow this film should prove to be one of the greatest productions of a military spectial. An immense number of harmless shells are being constructed for the purpose of making the performance realistic.

The Court of Appeal in Paris has finally decided the question as to the rights of a photographer over negatives taken by him. According to the "Gazette des Tribunaux," all negatives taken by a photographer are his absolute property, but he has no power as regards the production of prints or the right to exhibit them without the consent of the sitter, even though no sum has been paid for the taking of the negative.

At Wiesbaden, the famous German Spa, the health-searching population witnessed and took part in a rare moving picture treat. The daily life of the guests at the Spa, with its whole routine and with many interesting incidents beside, was reproduced in moving pictures. When the pictures were shown on a large screen, which had been drawn across the lake, everybody was there in the hope of seeing himself as others had seen him. There was an amusing entertainment in the Kurgarten, Wiesbaden, last week, when "Wiesbaden Kurlife" was reproduced by a cinematograph, so that everybody wandered to the Kurgarten in the hope of seeing himself at some important gathering of social life. A large screen had been drawn across the lake, on which the pictures were thrown. First was seen life on the Wilhelmstrasse during promenade hour, scenes on the Kurhaus terrace during the afternoon concert being next exhibited. The departure of three coaches on their daily trip from the Kurhaus was also shown. But the greatest interest was called forth by the pictures of the recent race meeting, taken from different parts of the course, in front of the first, second, and third stands, the pari-mutuel and the paddock. Almost every one of the 20,000 people present must have crossed the focus of the camera once, and the delight of the onlookers when they recognized themselves was most amusing. "Oh, there I am!" "Don't you see me?" and "How I was hurrying to place my bet!" were the usual remarks, but one Miss Vanity had time to notice that her hat inclined to one side. "Dear me, my hat is not on straight!" she remarked amid general laughter.

Whatever may be the policy of the American film maker in dealing with the question of paying for decent scenarios, there is nothing small about our brethren in France, and scenario writers over there are able to indulge all the luxuries of modern civilization. M. Henri Lavedan received for a scenario consisting of two hundred lines the tidy little sum of 8,000 francs, something like forty francs a line. The pauper labor of the scenario industry is not done on the other side of the big pond.

Superior Plays

BY LOUIS REEVES HARRISON.

THERE is an action of the soul more intensely interesting than the purely automatic movements in moving pictures ever can be, and, on this account, I shall review a remarkable Vitagraph production in which the inner emotions find wonderful expressions through the medium of their accomplished leading woman, Miss Turner. The piece itself, like the stories of Hawthorne and Guy de Maupassant, conforms to Poe's requirement that a clear idea of a unified purpose should so dominate the action as to leave a profound impression upon those to whom the idea is transferred. It gets close to pulsating life as we know it and feel it ourselves, so it is quite as well of to-day as of yesterday, a transmutation of life into pictorial art and back again to life as it pours through the channels of our being, gripping the spectator with convincing power.

At the beginning of the picture some draperies are drawn aside and disclose a setting of Oriental splendor. In the left foreground are Persian curtains behind which there is something transpiring unseen by the audience. There is a woman listening (Miss Turner in the title role), in an attitude of tragic anxiety and fear. In dread of discovery, yet unable to control her intense curiosity, she cautiously opens the hanging screen and peers through. She is laboring under excitement, as if expecting the worst—the worst thing a woman ever discovers is that she has a successful rival—and is so tormented that she cannot at first summon courage to look. Her expression of anguish when she realizes that she is what the title of the piece indicates, "A Discarded Favorite," is a masterly exhibition of what is dramatic in the pictured story. Action alone may not be dramatic nor the revelation of passion, but when that passion is so presented as to lay bare the human soul and its animus, presaging the thrilling events that naturally result, the picture rises to great heights in the dramatic art.

The discarded favorite is alone in the scene—the whole play is a silent communication of the spirit, and, according to Maurice Maeterlinck, speech never communicates the real and inmost thoughts. If "we do not know each other we have not yet dared to be silent together." According to this great poet the pictorial drama must be destined to take high place in the arts, as he believes that we talk to fill up the blanks of thinking and never to reveal our true selves. The discarded favorite, being alone, has the courage to let the truth be told in her countenance and movements. The audience gazes into the mystery of a human soul.

We sit entranced while this woman reveals one phase of emotion after another until she falls on the floor and writhes in a paroxysm of fierce passion. Wild with jealousy, restrained by physical fear, she becomes exhausted by the violent racking of her sensibilities, then her attention is attracted to the gifts of the human creature she has idealized. She tears off the bejeweled badges of her shame and tramples them under foot. She adds to these sacrifices on the altar of vanity from her casket in a riot of destruction. Those of us who have reached a disillusioned state of mind only pity her mildly until she comes upon a simple memento of her love, a medallion containing his picture, when her childish tears and abject misery over, past love and happiness gone beyond recall tug at one of the most sensitive strings in the human heart.

Like a flash comes a transformation in her mood. The coarse and powerful hand of a man appears between the curtains and indicates a service to be performed. She arranges two glasses on a tray and pours them full of wine with the grace of long-established custom, her habitual mode of activity completely dominating her overwrought emotions for a brief moment. The mental disturbance under which she has been laboring, however, has induced derangement and she becomes possessed by a form of insanity. A hateful impulse enters her enfeebled brain, that which starts monomaniacs upon the commission of crime. This insane purpose now characterizes every move; the woman becomes the victim of an idea which she regards as a necessity. She uses all the stealth and cunning of a lunatic in taking a phial of poison from a cabinet and empties it into the glasses, dividing it with cheerful impartiality, but kissing the rim of the glass intended for her god of clay.

The author may or may not have intended the portrayal to be that of woman yielding to mental derangement, but Miss Turner so depicts it and in accordance with true art. The sight of a second hand, the bejeweled one of a woman, restraining the outreach of the man's coarse member should make the situation behind the curtain plain to the dullest mind and it is powerfully effective with those who have easily guessed the concealed action. The effect upon the discarded favorite is one terrible to behold—her entire body quivers, then becomes absolutely rigid as if she had been turned to stone in a moment of intense hate. The dominant, murderous idea has now taken full possession of her mind and she is nerved to the performance of the deed in cold blood. She even weighs the chances of using a dagger instead of poison, but settles upon the first course, and deliberately carries the wine out through the curtains to her loved one and her rival.

The stage, on which one character alone has appeared, is now empty. The terrific suspense already produced is sufficient to hold the continuity of the piece until the character in whom all interest is centered returns. If anything, this brief absence raises excitement to the highest pitch. What will be the result? We soon know. The woman comes staggering back like one pursued by haunting vengeance, her eyes aflame with terror while movements of the curtain portray the convulsive struggle between life and death which, in a larger way, is the sum of human existence. The penetrating force of the dramatic effect is most keenly felt when it is seen that the man has fallen near the curtain. Again his hand and arm protrude—this time quivering with the frightful pain that racks the body when the spirit is wrenched from its habitation by violence.

The death of that hand marks the climax.

The downward movement from this period, so often poorly treated, is satisfactory and artistic in the highest degree. The catastrophe at the end is as it should be, no surprise to those watching the trend of events. It takes fine sensibilities on the part of the playwright, producer, and artist to make good use of the end and impress a lasting effect. The murderess is now terrorized. She has lost the nerve which sustained her in the crisis—but is still impelled by the homicidal idea. She seizes the dagger, staggers about the room, stabs herself, totters towards the curtained recess and falls out of reach of the dead hand. She recovers. A last impulse revives her. She must die with her hand clasping the hand of the man she loved. In her death agonies this idea becomes supreme. She crawls inch by inch over the floor, a gasping, quivering wretch, now falling helplessly, now making a desperate effort until her end is attained. She grasps the lifeless hand in her own and dies, unfaltering in her one great passion, her face glorified by it in death.

MACON, GA., WELL SUPPLIED.

Macon, Ga., a city of 50,000 people, seems to be well supplied with picture theaters, which are: The Palace, J. B. Melton, manager, seats 600, admission 10 cents; Lyric, Dan Holt, manager, seats 250, admission 10 cents; Theatorium, Dan Holt, manager, seats 200, admission 5 cents; Victoria, M. L. Roylston, manager, seats 200, admission 5 cents; Crumps Park Theater, Macon Railway and Light Co., proprietors, seats 900. Aside from these regular picture houses the Grand, legitimate theater, D. G. Phillips, manager, and the Bijou, stock house, J. B. Melton, manager, frequently run pictures.

Mr. C. D. Struble, Secretary-Treasurer of the United Motion Picture Company of Oklahoma City, was one of the callers at The World office this week. He reports the Independent program as being strong in this vicinity and mentioned the Mutt and Jeff pictures as being the biggest favorites, with Rex and Imp also keeping a front place.

Kinemacolor Makes a Hit

Herald Square Theater Crowded Nightly with Enthusiastic Audiences—Generous Applause for Pictures.

If the temper of the audiences that have been crowding Herald Square Theatre, New York City, daily, to see the Coronation pictures produced by the Urban-Smith Kinemacolor process and shown here by the Kinemacolor Company of America, is an indication of the sort of reception that will be accorded those pictures in other cities, record business will be the rule everywhere. The first public presentation of the Kinemacolor Coronation pictures was given on Saturday, July 29, principally for the members of the press. The first real show was held Monday evening following, when the house was practically sold out. Since then there has been nothing but crowded houses and a very encouraging advance sale.

These pictures have been reviewed before and have been pronounced the greatest achievement that the World of Motion Pictures has yet known. Words fail to adequately describe the beauties of the production—it must be seen to be fully comprehended.

The production is in eleven reels beginning with a view of London before the Coronation and concludes with views of the naval review, requiring about two hours to show. With the very first scenes the Herald Square audience responded with most generous applause which was continued with little interruption throughout the evening.

Effects have been introduced which strengthen the pictures and a good lecturer interprets scenes that would be less effective without proper description. These with a good orchestra gave a finished entertainment, the like of which has never before been presented upon a motion picture screen in New York.

Regarding the Coronation pictures several of the New York papers made extended comment, extracts from which are here reprinted:

New York Times: Scenes of the ceremonials of the recent coronation of King George V. were shown at the Herald Square Theater yesterday afternoon for the first time in all the natural colors of uniforms and scenery, and with much of the impressiveness of real pageants, and yesterday's audience was moved to frequent applause by the brilliancy of the tones and the excellent likenesses of the figures in the pictures.

Most of the principal incidents of the coronation festivities were exhibited, the entertainment lasting fully two hours, with brief intermissions.

The last series showed the naval review at Spithead, and this picture was by far the most interesting protographically. The color of the water, the changing hues of the sky, the colors of the flags on the battleships, were so real the audience could forget it was looking at a picture.

New York Herald: If you weren't able to get over to the coronation, but you have a quarter or fifty cents at the most about you, you can get an excellent idea of the great pageant when King George was crowned without leaving Broadway. The Herald Square Theater is now displaying motion pictures, in color, of the great show. There are eleven scenes, so to speak, in this picture play. The visitor is first taken on a tour of London before the coronation. The view of a flower market displayed the color quality of the pictures to fine advantage. The dedication of the Victorian Memorial was shown in all its brilliancy, the royal party walking over from Buckingham Palace, the review of the troops and all the other pageantry being shown in a striking manner. And so it went throughout two hours of the entertainment, until the final pictures of the naval review at Spithead closed the display.

New York American: The coronation ceremonies were presented in all their phases on the screen of the stage of the Herald Square. The King and Queen were shown a score of times, so much so that one felt quite intimate with them when it was over. Certainly the audience became familiar with the costumes they wore and their coloring. In many places the colorings were wonderful and beautiful. The delicate tints of the leaves on the trees as they swayed in the light breeze about Windsor Castle was remarkably real. As to the gorgeous costumes of those who took part in the royal pageants, they seemed far more accurate than paint and brush could make them.

After seeing the event in London and Windsor, the naval pageant was shown. It was then that the audience broke out into its greatest applause. The movement of the vessels and the lashing of the sea against them was realistic in the extreme.

New York Press: The kinemacolor or colored motion pictures of the coronation festivities of King George and Queen Mary of England were presented in the Herald Square Theater yesterday for the first time in this country. To the eye the scene could not have been more brilliant nor truer in the original. The pictures are much better than the real sights seen by the ordinary spectator in London who had a poor point of vantage. The pictures, for motion and color, reach the climax of realism. As showing a new process, they are well worth seeing. They startle the imagination by the manner in which, without the use of paint on the films, such brilliancy can be presented on the screen.

DEATH OF WHITING ALLEN.

One of the best known advance men in the theatrical business, Whiting Allen, died at the Sherman Hotel, Chicago, Ill., on July 27. Death was due to heart disease following an attack of acute gastritis. He was born in Youngstown, Ohio, fifty-six years ago. Beginning life as a newspaper man he soon emerged in the theatrical field and became press agent for Sells Brothers and Forepaugh's circus, and later joined Barnum and Bailey's circus in the same capacity. With Buffalo Bill's Wild West Show Mr. Whiting toured Europe. Returning to this country he held the position of dramatic critic of the Philadelphia North American for a short time. Later he was with the Metropolitan Opera Company, Daniel V. Arthur and Ringling Brothers. At the time of his death he was representing the Kinemacolor Company of America, being one of the corps of advance men engaged by that concern to present the coronation pictures. He was a Friar and a Mason. A widow survives him.

Technique of the Photoplay

Chapter IV.
LEADERS AND LETTERS.

Leaders are far more important in photoplays than most writers imagine.

That they are useful early becomes apparent, since they are the medium through which necessary explanation is conveyed to the audience, marking the passage of time or making clear the motives or mental processes of the characters which cannot be definitely expressed in pantomime.

Frequently the privilege is sadly abused, but the abuse corrects itself, since the manuscript bristling with leaders is passed by in favor of the simple story which requires few printed explanations. The ideal story requires no leader at all, but unfolds the plot entirely in pictured action. It is seldom that the ideal is attained without the sacrifice of clarity. The leader may be regarded as a necessary evil and the aim of the author should be to use as little as possible.

The leader, as has been explained, is the printed explanation thrown upon the screen. It is not a separate lantern slide, but a part of the film. The general rule allows three feet to the first line and two feet to each succeeding line of the same leader. A two-line leader uses five feet of film; a three-line consumes seven feet. Where ten two-line leaders are employed, one twentieth of the reel is taken up with leader. Add a couple of fifteen foot letters and allow ten feet each for the title and censorship tag, and one-tenth of the thousand-foot reel is used for inserted matter to the exclusion of the picture. "I come in here to see pictures and they're makin' me read a book," is the way one small boy phrased it, and he voiced the sentiments of his elders. The audience goes to see pictures; not to puzzle over leaders.

Leader Interrupts the Action.

Technically the introduction of leaders is to be avoided because the flashing of printed or other matter upon the screen interrupts the action of the play. Not alone does it consume the alloted length, but for one or two seconds following the return of the picture to the screen the mind of the spectator is still busy with the import of the leader, and any important action occuring immediately following the leader is apt to be overlooked.

For this reason many directors hold the action slow for a moment following the leader, just as they refuse to let in a leader in the middle of a scene, even though a word or two at the moment would clear the plot and obviate a later and more lengthy leader. Sometimes the line is flashed before the scene opens, but this is objectionable in that it removes the element of suspense.

Leader is also used to "break" scenes where required. It may happen that two scenes are to be played in the same setting with an interval between. Without the leader the two scenes would follow with nothing to show the lapse of time. The action would appear continuous and the characters would either leave the stage to reappear immediately or another set of characters would fairly jump into the scene. A leader stating that it is "The Next Day. The Quarrel is Renewed" serves as a drop curtain to separate the scenes.

Breaking a Scene.

Similarly it may be that the scene is an actress's dressing-room. She enters in street clothes and prepares to assume her stage wardrobe. Nothing can happen to advance the plot until she has changed, yet it is impossible to keep the scene going. A leader flashes, and when the scene returns the costume has been assumed and both time and modesty are saved. The same process may be applied to cover the progress of laborious work. The burglar digs a hole in which to hide his booty. To complete the task will require a greater space of time than is allotted to the entire reel. A leader breaks the scene after the first few spadefuls of earth are turned and now the hole is completed and the box is buried.

A leader should not be used in front of the first scene. This is done at times, but not by the careful producers. The break from the title of the film to the leader is not as strongly marked as the break from title to picture and, before the spectator realizes that a leader has replaced the title, the line is gone and a vital explanation is lost. Where a leader is absolutely necessary before the story starts, it is better to write in a ten-foot scene that will mark a break, then write the leader and start the story. This is doubly necessary in many theaters where a slovenly operator threads his film to start on the picture rather than on the title.

Be Brief and Fluent.

It is not sufficient that the leader should be brief. It should be fluent as well. "For his sister's sake Dick is silent" expresses the fact as definitely as "Dick does not deny the crime in order that he may keep from Nell the knowledge of her brother's crime," and uses seven words against twenty. It may be argued that "his sister" might be either Dick's or Bob's, but it has been shown that Bob has a sister.

"Two years have passed. Bob is sent West in disgrace" is a leader that serves a double purpose. It breaks the passage of time and fixes a fact. For all the story might show otherwise, the scene immediately followed the one that preceded it in point of time as well as position on the reel. By explaining that two years have passed it is shown that Bob is not being sent West on account of the theft from the safe, but that his behavior in the last two years has brought his sins home to him. It also gives Dick a chance to become manager of the ranch.

"The next day" is simple, but it is used so frequently that it becomes monotonous and it is better to say "the next morning," "the next afternoon," etc. The leader may seem unimportant, but too much care cannot be given to the polishing of the phrase. Make it sound smooth and easy.

But before you write a break leader, look at the matter from all angles and see if you cannot accomplish the same result and stick to the pictures. Suppose that in the dressing-room scene you broke to the stage, and showed the hero waiting for the overture to be called. He and the villain pass and exchange glances. Just ten or fifteen feet—twelve feet more than your leader—but it is in the picture. Your burglar starts to dig. Perhaps there is a posse looking for him. Flash ten feet of the posse and come back to the burglar. There are times when you will find that you can even do an explanatory leader into action if you think it over long enough, but in any event try to break your awkward pauses with action whether it is to jump the action ahead or to cover the fact that you've left the hero standing on a scene and need him immediately in the next.

Skillful planning means much to the finish of a picture. The care in breaking scenes, or the lack of it, marks the difference between the amateur and the experienced writer.

Letters are Preferable.

For some reason there is less objection on the part of the audience to a letter than to a leader. Letters written or read by a character on the scene appear as a part of the action and the use of this material is not resented when too many letters are not employed. Where you can, it is well to replace the leader with a letter.

A reference to scene twenty-one will show how the letter is read. The essential action is:

—cowboy rides into picture—gives Dick a telegram—Dick reads:
On screen—telegram.
Richard Blake,
Elkhorn, Nev.
Am arriving 3.20. Please meet me. Nell.
Back to scene—Dick calls servant, etc.

This all appears to be a part of the action, but it carries the fact that Nell is coming to visit her brother's grave—and her subsequent appearance on the scene is explained.

Where letters are written instead of read the procedure is much the same. The person writing takes up the pen and starts to write. In the joining room the scene is cut and the written letter is inserted.

Identifying Letters.

Where there are two or more letters, or where it is desired to establish the identity of a paper subsequent to its first showing, it is well to throw the letter on the screen again. Always give the number of the scene in which the letter was originally flashed and it will not be necessary to repeat the letter in the script. In the flash but two or three feet are shown instead of from fifteen to thirty feet.

It is essential that a leter should be brief, that too much time may not be required for its showing. Sometimes it is better to show only a part of the letter, the essential paragraph. In this case the letter is written in this fashion:

On screen—paragraph from letter, one or two lines above and below.
unless I hear from you by then.
Charlie Newell, the son of Camden Newell, the millionaire, is to visit your city. He has a fad for assuming other identities. Last year he posed as his sister's chauffeur, and no one ever suspected.
I shall give your message to Bessie, also the receipt to mother.

This looks more convincing that a letter which tells in a single paragraph that Newell is coming. No girl would confine herself to the one statement, without even a postscript, but the paragraph could appear with other material and be picked out for the screen. Then, when some astonished chauffeur finds himself a social lion, the audience is prepared to understand because, like the girl, they have read the letter.

Clippings Are Easy to Read.

The same thing may be done with newspaper clippings and the clipping has the advantage of being in print and therefore more easily read. In the case of the above item it could be done into print thus:

On screen—newspaper item.

It is hinted that Charlie Newell, the young heir to the Newell millions, is again seeking to avoid the designing mammas by an exchange of identities and tour the resorts as a professional chauffeur. His exploit last year, when for the entire summer he posed as the driver of his sister's car, will be long remembered.

The item might be condensed slightly, but the idea is the same. Instead of reading a letter the heroine picks up a society sheet and glances over the pages, suddenly she starts and by her eagerness shows that she is greatly interested. The curiosity of the audience is aroused and a moment later the curiosity is gratified as the item is flashed upon the screen.

Where the information is brief it may be better displayed as a newspaper headline. A two column display head is better shaped for use on the screen than the deeper single column head. Your daily paper will give you an idea of how to write the headline. A deal of information may be conveyed in a headline and the spectator seems to read the item over the character's shoulder rather than to have been interrupted by a leader.

The Use of Legal Papers.

It is not unusal to use wills to explain the situation. Only the essential clauses should be shown and the will may be used as a leader or read. The following gives an idea of how the matter is handled.

Library—relatives sitting about regarding each other distrustfully. Lawyer enters—greets company—opens small handbag and extracts will.
On screen—flash printed form of will with name of Howard Erskine.
Back to scene—lawyer opens will and reads—after a moment, surprise is expressed by those present—Dick and Grace spring up excitedly—
On screen—clause of will—
Fourth—I give and bequeath to my nephew, Richard Peyton Corson, and my niece, Grace Eleanor Henson, the sum of one million dollars ($1,000,000), jointly, on condition that they marry each other within six months from the day this will is read.
Back to scene—lawyer finishes reading—folds will—returns to bag—bows and exits—others crowd around Dick and Grace—etc.

Deeds, mortgages and other legal papers may be identified in similar fashion and blank forms for these may be had of any legal stationer. It is not expected that you will supply these. Merely indicate what you want and the properly man will look after the preparation.

The intelligent use of titles and other inserts will do much to make your story clear. The intelligent avoidance of titles and inserts will go far toward making your story interesting. Steer the middle course; but a story requiring much explanation is never a good subject for filming.

TESTING CHAUFFEURS BY AID OF MOVING PICTURES.

The latest movement brought about by the Assistant Commissioner of the Police in London, England, is the testing of automobile drivers by means of animated pictures. The drivers will undergo a severe examination by being questioned on the parts of a stationary auto and will then be taken into a projection room and again tested by moving pictures. Such scenes as a child crossing the path of the automobile, and others calculated to make the drivers nervous will be displayed. An official, concealed, will be watching every movement of the chauffeur while this exhibition is being held.

BIG SEIZURE OF FILM.

A Novel Proceeding Under the New Copyright Law.

The Monopol Film Company, of 145 W. 45th St., which claims the sole American rights of the Milano Film Company's production of "Dante's Inferno," obtained in the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York, an order for the seizure of certain films belonging to one B. E. Clements and alleged to be infringements of the Milano production. The order or "writ of assistance," as it is technically termed, is unique and, as it has never before been used in litigation, it is published in substance as follows:

"The President of the United States of America, to the United States Marshal for the Southern District of New York, Greeting: Whereas, a bill of complaint has been duly filed in the United States Circuit Court for the Southern District of New York on the 28th of July, 1911, in an action or proceeding by the complainant, the Monopol Film Company against the defendants, B. E. Clements and Isaac W. Ullman, Charles E. Kimball and Israel Ablowich, co-partners engaged in business in the Borough of Manhattan, City of New York, under the firm name and style of the National Film Distributing Company, arising under the Act to amend and consolidate the Acts respecting copyright approved March 4th, 1909; and

"Whereas, it appears from the said bill of complaint and the exhibits attached thereto, and from certain affidavits upon which said bill of complaint, exhibits and affidavits, this writ is based, that the complainant is the owner and proprietor of the copyright of the moving picture film entitled 'Dante's Inferno,' and that the defendants, and each of them, have infringed said copyright and have in their possession * * * certain prints, and other media of publication and reproduction of the said moving picture film, as well as infringing copies and prints thereof, and a sufficient bond and undertaking having been duly filed by the complainant.

"Now, therefore, you are commanded to seize, take and safely hold, subject to the order of this court, the prints, impressions and other articles or media from or upon which the said moving picture film, 'Dante's Inferno,' of which this complainant is the owner, is or can be copied, printed or reproduced, and each and evry copy, print or reproduction of said moving picture film above named, found by you in the possession of the defendants above named, they and each of their associates; * * and you are hereby commanded thereupon to serve a copy of this writ and of the said verified complaint and the affidavit and undertaking annexed thereto and hereinbefore referred to upon the defendants as required by law, and then to make immediate return of such seizure or attempted seizure to this court.

"Witness: The Honorable Edward D. White, Chief Justice of the United States, at the Borough of Manhattan, City of New York, on the 28th day of July in the year of our Lord 1911, and of the Independence of the United States of America the one hundred and thirty-sixth."

The defendants in the action deny that there was any infringement on their part.

Upon filing a heavy bond the defendants obtained an order later, returning the seized film to their possession.

GETTING THE BIG HATS OFF.

H. H. Durgin, proprietor of the "Spa" picture theater at Pittsfield, Mass., has been wrestling with the question of getting the ladies who like to wear big hats to remove them while in his house so that others may see the pictures. After careful consideration he decided to put the question plainly to the wearers of the big hats, and the following announcement was flashed on the screen:

Ladies will kindly remove their hats. Those not wishing to comply with this rule can step to the box office and have the price of their ticket refunded.

A few trials convinced Mr. Durgin that he had hit the right solution of a difficult problem and he now advises other managers to adopt his plan.

$40,000 PICTURE HOUSE FOR NASHVILLE.

Nashville, Tenn., is to have a $40,000 picture theater. It will be built on Church Street and Fifth Avenue by W. P. Ready, one of Nashville's popular theater men, who promises one of the largest and handsomest theater buildings in the South. Plans call for a seating capacity of 1,200. Brick, concrete and steel are the materials to be used in construction. The latest devices to insure the comfort of patrons will be installed. Mr. Ready is at present manager of the Alhambra Theater, Nashville.

NATIONAL EXHIBITORS ASSOCIATION.

Successfully Organized At Cleveland—More Than 200 Earnest and Enthusiastic Picture Men Present.

M. A. NEFF, OF CINCINNATI, CHOSEN TO BE PRESIDENT.

Sales Company Entertains Exhibitors at Banquet—Chicago Gets Next Year's Convention—Second Tuesday in August, 1911.

More than 200 picturemen, representing every branch of the motion picture trade, assembled in Cleveland, Ohio, on August 1, and in the course of their deliberations successfully organized the National Exhibitors' Association. The meetings were held in Welser's Hall and were marked for the earnestness of the deliberations. Confusion of purpose, such as might easily disturb and even disrupt a movement of this character, was absent, and those present approached the work before them with enthusiasm and determination. The result is highly satisfactory.

A most happy choice of officers for the first and most critical year of the National Association was made. M.

M. A. NEFF,
President of the National Exhibitors' Association.

A. Neff, of Cincinnati, Ohio, for some time past president of the Ohio State Exhibitors' League, was elected president. A better choice could hardly have been made, and the enthusiasm which marked the proceedings at this juncture testified to the great popularity of the candidate and the confidence placed in him by exhibitors generally. Other officers elected were: C. M. Christianson, of Cleveland, secretary, and A. J. Rieder, of Jackson, Mich., treasurer. Each State Association was accorded a vice-president.

The officers elected were empowered to transact all business of the Association during the coming year until the next convention, which was appointed to be held on the second Tuesday in August, 1912, in Chicago. The Chicago delegation were on hand early and worked strong to secure the next meeting for the "Windy City." There was almost no opposition and Chicago won hands down. It is doubtful if a better selection could be made, for Chicago is in the middle of the best there is in the motion picture theater business.

Resolutions were adopted urging all State Associations to affiliate with the National organization, and urging exhibitors in States not organized to start the work of organization at once. Indications are that there will be great activity among exhibitors all over the country immediately following the convention.

The personnel of the convention was remarkable. No trade gathering has occurred that was composed of more intelligent, alert and purposeful business men than those at the Cleveland convention of motion picture exhibitors, and the manner in which they approached the business of the meeting proved them to be capable and determined to establish an organization that would be a benefit to the business in which they are engaged.

In the way of entertainment there was plenty to engage the attention of the delegates. The manufacturing interests were well represented, and the Motion Picture Distributing and Sales Company provided an elaborate banquet.

At the time of going to press THE MOVING PIC-meeting, but this will appear next week in unabridged TURE WORLD is unable to give a full report of the form.

CHICAGO LETTER.

By Jas. S. McQuade.

THE exhibitor who caters chiefly to transient patrons is prone at times to sacrifice the picture for an extra five cents. There is a line of people standing out in front. The main object for the unscrupulous exhibitor, is to get them in and then out, as soon as possible, in order to make way for the next line. The signal is given to the operator to put on express speed. One thousand feet of film is rushed through in ten minutes, and then another and another at the same reckless rate. The spectators pass out, rubbing their eyes and mystified, wondering what the blurred and hazy images on the screen meant and blaming the pictures instead of the dishonest manager.

Yes, dishonest; for the manager in such a case is obtaining money under false pretenses. Furthermore, he is injuring the reputation of the manufacturers whose product he is exhibiting, and the business of exhibitors who use the films after him, owing to deterioration of the films so abused. The exchange that rents the films is also a loser.

Such managers, and Chicago has a number of them, care nothing for the uplift of the picture business. All they can see is a five cent piece and it is large enough to obscure anything and everything else.

Now that exhibitors' associations are being formed, a way may be found to correct this crying evil by exhibitors themselves. Since offenders of this type are so blinded by money, a fine might prove the most effective corrective. It would touch a sensitive spot.

Alhambra Added to Saxe Enterprises.

The Alhambra Theater, Milwaukee, which for the last two seasons has been on the Shubert circuit of houses, has been leased for a long term by the Saxe Brothers, who control the Saxe amusement enterprises in the Cream City. The deal was closed Wednesday last and possession will be taken August 20.

Manager S. L. Rothapfel has been running a picture show in the Alhambra this summer with great success, being a competitor of the Saxe picture houses, which represent an investment of $200,000. These include the Princess, Mojeska, Crystal, Globe and Theatorium, the first mentioned ranking among the finest in the country. The Saxe Bros. also own and manage the Orpheum, in Milwaukee, a vaudeville theater that is playing to successful business.

The addition of the Alhambra secures for the Saxe amusement enterprises undisputed control of picture entertainment in Milwaukee. Thomas Saxe, who was seen Friday, July 28, while in Chicago, informed me that it is his purpose to run pictures in the Alhambra all the year round. The house will be remodeled, so as to make it more suitable for pictures. The plans contemplate carrying forward the balcony and gallery, so as to bring the seats closer to the stage and afford a good view from every chair.

The leasing of the Alhambra by the Saxe Bros. was a master stroke of business skill and diplomacy, as the former lessee, Herman Fehr, a wealthy capitalist, who runs the Star and Majestic theaters, has held the lease for 17 years and fully expected to have it renewed this year. A high rental will be paid, but Mr. Saxe states that he will be satisfied if pictures make the expenses break even with the receipts. At that he has little fear of being able to reap handsome profits.

"We have in the Alhambra the largest and finest picture theater in America," said Mr. Saxe. "It seats 1,800 people, and has one of the handsomest interiors in the country and is luxuriously appointed."

The Saxe Bros, were born in Milwaukee and are self-made men. In addition to their theatrical ventures, they operate a number of dairy lunch restaurants in Milwaukee and own extensive interests in Minneapolis. They have raised picture entertainment to a high plane in their home city and number among their patrons the best known residents.

The Press and the Picture Theater.

The disposition of the daily press to seize upon any news item that may be used to reflect on the picture theater, when treated sensationally and with glaring exaggeration, is a discredit to journalism.

At the Lincoln Theater, on North Clark Street, Chicago, an exploding fuse set fire to a film in the operating room, one evening recently. The operating booth being fireproof there was no danger of the flame spreading, but the smoke and the sound of the explosion alarmed the 200 people in the house and they crowded towards the exits. Manager Siebel announced to the excited people that there was no danger and, to calm them, he began to sing the chorus of a popular song. He succeeded in halting the rush, which had caused the trampling of several children, but not seriously.

The loss, including the films consumed, amounted to about $300.

Next morning the leading paper gave this item a glaring scare head, the article and heading containing such words as "panic," "women faint," "spectators stampede," etc. The loss was given as $7,000.

The operator of the Lincoln was slightly burned on the face and hands and was partially overcome by the gases formed.

National Convention for Chicago, 1912?

Wm. J. Sweeney and C. A. Anderson, representing the Chicago Exhibitors' Association, called last week on Mr. Spangler, secretary of the committee on conventions for the Association of Commerce, to ascertain what inducements could be offered in case the national convention of exhibitors could be secured for Chicago in 1912. Mr. Spangler took up the question very enthusiastically and stated that the association would be pleased to furnish a hall for the convention, free, and contribute in every possible way to make the stay of the visitors enjoyable.

Chicago, in addition to being the banner convention city of America, is centrally located and has two large film manufacturing plants, the Selig Polyscope Company and the Essanay, which could be visited and inspected with interest and profit by delegates.

The Chicago delegation to the national convention at Cleveland, in addition to the three regularly appointed delegates, will include the following exhibitors: Sam Schiller, F. Francke, C. Hull, Louis Franks, L. Friedman, A. Gollos, A. Natkin, Geo. Henry and Operator L. E. Reiner. The appointed delegates are Sidney Smith, Wm. J. Sweeney and C. A. Anderson.

The film manufacturers and importers of Chicago will be represented as follows: George Kleine, by R. R. Nehls, in charge of the Kleine film department; the Selig Polyscope Company, by Mr. Twist, of the publicity department of that firm, and the Essanay Company, by Geo. K. Spoor, who intends to be in Cleveland on Wednesday, August 2.

Thos. A. Edison, Inc., will be represented by the local agent in Cleveland; the Edengraph Company, by Mr. Swett, of the New York office; Pathe Freres, by K. W. Linn, and the Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Company, by L. A. Woodward. Maurice Fleckles expects to be there to represent both the "Imp" and the Laemmle exchange. It is expected that every film manufacturing plant, both licensed and independent, will be represented and that all manufacturers of supplies and supply firms will have representatives present.

Chicago Film Brevities.

Among the new suits filed in the United States Circuit Court, Chicago, Monday, July 17, were Nos. 30,455 and 30,456, the Motion Picture Patents Company vs. Wm. H. Swanson, trading as Wm. H. Swanson & Co.

Emil C. Meyer, formerly owner of the Senate Theater, this city, and now manager of the Penn Square Amusement Company, Cleveland, O., is making arrangements to organize an association of exhibitors in that city.

J. W. Cotter, manager of the Western Film Exchange, Kansas City (Independent), visited the city early last week. He was accompanied by Mr. Cotter and visited quite a number of old friends in the film business. Mr. and Mrs. Cotter are now spending their summer vacation.

Mr. Sargeant, producer of the Powers Company, New York, accompanied by J. Emile Rivoire, was in Chicago the latter part of the week of July 17, making pictures of the Buffalo Bill's Wild West show. Mr. Rivoire had charge of the technical end and Mr. Sargeant of production. They left with the show, which departed west from Chicago.

Julius Singer, manager of the Laemmle Film Service, Kansas City, was a visitor last week. Mr. Singer opened the Kansas City office a short time ago, and reports that, though the heat was excessive, business has been very fair.

D. J. Chatkin, of the American Film Manufacturing Company, is now on the road demonstrating the American product to exhibitors.

S. S. Hutchinson, president of the American Film Manufacturing Company when last heard from was in Paris, and complained about the intense heat. He writes enthusiastically over the healthy condition of the moving picture business in Europe, and of the bright prospects for the American product generally, during the coming season.

R. E. Aitken, formerly of St. Louis, and now manager of the Western Import & Film Company, London, Eng., was in the city last week, on his way from Waukesha, Wis. (where he spent a vacation with his mother), to New York, and thence to London. Mr. Aitken expects a banner business for the American product in Europe the coming season.

O. T. Crawford, the exchange man of St. Louis, and his brother, Roy Crawford, of Wichita, Kan., spent three days in Chicago recently on business. Roy Crawford owns the largest picture theater in his home town.

H. E. Aitken, of the Western Film Exchange, New York, paid a business visit to the city last week.

C. A. Anderson, owner of the Hermosa Theater (Indpt.), is spending a vacation that will last two months, near Koontz Lake, Walkerton, Ind. During his absence Mr. Anderson has arranged with his employees on a profit system, they having full charge of the theater.

Wm. J. Sweeney, owner of the Standard Theater, this city, is remodeling that house. He will reopen on Aug. 12.

Wm. H. Bomb, assistant to Manager Wm. H. Bell, of the G. F. Co.'s branch, 435 N. Clark Street, is spending a vacation near Elkhart, Ind.

Joseph Hopp, president of the Standard Film Exchange, recently exchanged two of his out-of-the-city theaters for 320 acres of improved farm land in Hand County, S. D. He also assumed a mortgage on the tract. Mr. Hopp and his son, Edgar, will visit the land next week, and will stop over at Sioux Falls, where the Standard has a branch office. This office is managed by F. J. Murphie, who formerly held the position of correspondent with the Standard in this city.

Mr. Hopp has purchased the exclusive state rgihts of "Temptations of a Great City" (three reels), from the Great Northern, for Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Wisconsin and Minnesota. He will begin to take bookings for the subject the latter part of August. The United States copyright of the film has been perfected and all importations, other than by the New York office of the Great Northern, will be confiscated by the United States Treasury Department.

Mr. V. U. Young, manager of the Orpheum Theater of Gary, Ind., has purchased the exclusive rights of the motion pictures of the city of Gary, which were produced some time ago by the Industrial Moving Picture Company of this city. The pictures have been indorsed by the Commercial Club of Gary and pronounced to be reliable pictorial views of Gary's activities as they actually exist. They will be exhibited throughout the country and used to influence the sale of Gary real estate.

Motion pictures of the Cowboys' Convention at Wyoming, which were taken by the Industrial Motion Picture Company of this city, were shown here at a private exhibition several days ago. The pictures are full of vim and action and are most interesting portrayals of the sports and pastimes of the brawny Westerner. The time has not as yet been set for their release, but they will be distributed in the near future and exhibited throughout the country.

Nat Goodwin in Pictures

An Incorporator of New Company Which Will Reproduce His Dramatic Successes.

Nat Goodwin has become a motion picture actor. Hereafter his acting will be "canned." The Co-Operative Film Manufacturing Company is the company he will play for. Mr. Goodwin is one of the incorporators of the Co-Operative Company, is vice-president, and in addition to acting he will personally supervise the productiuon of all pictures. For these services he will receive, it is said, the largest salary ever paid to a motion picture actor and also a substantial share of its profits. The first play which will be produced will be a picture version of Clyde Fitch's Revolutionary War drama, "Nathan Hale." Mr. Goodwin appeared in this play a decade or so ago. The play will be filmed on three reels and will probably be released about September 9.

Charles Giblyn, a member of the Auditorium Stock Company in which Nat Goodwin is at present taking the leading role, is the man who succeeded in interesting Goodwin in the Co-Operative Film Manufacturing Company. Giblyn is the company's secretary and has been a prominent member of it since it started. He pointed out that great actors of past years are only great in name, now, and the only method by which an actor can hand down his art to posterity is by means of the motion pictures.

The film stories in which Goodwin will appear will be in the most part those plays in which he appeared successfully during his long stage career. The entire plays will probably be filmed, making it necessary to release three or more reels on the same subject. Among the early productions will be, in addition to "Nathan Hale," "David Garrick," "The Merchant of Venice," and "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Most of the pictures will probably be made on Goodwin's ranch, which is near Santa Monica, 17 miles from this city, and near the ocean. Another studio is being planned for the Santa Monica canyon, where the Biograph Company, on its recent visit here, made its most beautiful pictures.

McKee Rankin, also playing with the Auditorium Stock Company, will be connected with the corporation. He is under contract to furnish the company two scenarios a week. Most of the stories he will provide will probably be of the West in the early days. It is also probable that "The Danites" will be produced with Rankin in his original role.

Marjorie Rambeau, leading lady for the Auditorium Stock Company, with her mother, are heavy stockholders in the company. Miss Rambeau will probably appear in some of the releases.

The Co-Operative Film Manufacturing Company has been in operation for the past few months, but the names of the people associated with it were kept secret. Already pictures have been made of the San Diego ground-breaking ceremonies and of the San Diego exposition. Here, for the first time, a picture was made of the full military pontificial high mass of the Roman Catholic Church. The film was blessed by Bishop Conaty, so that it may be shown in any Catholic Church in the country. A sum running into four figures is said to have been paid the church for the exclusive right to make this picture.

Officers of the corporation are Daniel Markowitz, manager of the local branch of the California Film Exchange, president; Nat C. Goodwin, vice-president; William E. Edwards, second vice-president; C. Peters, treasurer, and Charles Giblyn, secretary.

A new camera known as the Peters camera is being used and a special electrical light invented by Dillwin Daniels, who is also with the corporation, is another innovation being used by the company.

EDISON OFF ON THE MAURETANIA.

Thomas A. Edison, the chief figure in the American moving picture field today, sailed on the Mauretania, August 2nd, for a few weeks' pleasure trip in Europe. "I'm not taking a vcation," he is reported to have said. The "Grand Old Man" never does take a vacation. His assistants and those who follow in his footsteps often grow weary trying to keep up with him, but Edison himself rests working. Leaving out his wonderful achievements, not the least of which are his motion picture inventions, the fact that his encouragement and inspiring example have taught mental efficiency to more great men who have been fortunate enough to have spent their younger days in his employ, than any other contemporary, is no slight thing in reckoning his usefulness to the age. Listen when three or four of these young men, grown up to do things, get together. They begin to talk about the Old Man, and everything they say is full of love and loyalty. It's an inspiration.

To Edison, it isn't himself but his work that is interesting. He counts himself no individual but an aggregate of cells. When he has spare time from his work he studies music; so, because he takes it right, he finds that "earth is a cinch."

A DECIDED IMPROVEMENT.

The new system of displaying programs as furnished by the Exhibitors' Advertising Company, of Chicago, Ill., ad. of which appears elsewhere in this journal, seems to be very popular among the exhibitors who have adopted same for their theaters. The company is comparatively new, but the number of customers which it now has enrolled is climbing up toward the thousand mark, a most phenomenal record for so short a space of time. This would go to show that the system is very complete and that the exhibitors all over the country believe that the idea is good and that the price is right. We cannot state at this time just what effect this new system will have on the old style of advertising with posters and paste, but we are of the opinion that it will fill a long felt want, so far as a modern method of advertising is concerned.

KEITH & PROCTOR'S FILM MAKERS?

A Strong Rumor Says So.

According to a seemingly well authenticated report Tom Cochran, the former manager of the Imp Company and lately connected with the Lubin Film Company, of Philadelphia, has signed a contract with Keith & Proctor as producer for a moving picture enterprise, which is to furnish exclusive service to the houses of the Keith & Proctor circuit.

It is said that a company of competent actors has been engaged and that the new concern will use for the present Lubin's old plant in Philadelphia.

How Buckwalter Saved the Show.

By M. H. Walker.

The writer was in Laramie, Wyo., last week, looking over a show house that was offered for sale. When the morning train came in from Denver, the owner of the house, Andrew Freeborough, was badly disappointed in finding no film. It was the last train of the day until about 11 that night and the only thing in sight was to close down the show. Freeborough called up the General Film offices in Denver by long distance phone and explained his situation. This was about 11 o'clock in the morning. In about half an hour he was called up and told that H. H. Buckwalter, manager of the office, would start at noon and carry the film to Cheyenne by auto and send it from there by the Overland Limited train which passes through Cheyenne, but does not connect with Denver. The distance between Denver and Cheyenne by auto road—which is merely a trail across the prairie—is about 120 miles. The train leaves Cheyenne at 4 o'clock and this would necessitate an average speed of over thirty miles an hour—an almost impossible performance over such roads.

Bets were placed in Laramie that Buckwalter would not make the Cheyenne train on time and that he would not get the film in for the night's show, even if he drove all the way to Laramie, as the last sixty miles of the drive was over an awful road across the mountain.

At 6:30, when the Limited reached Laramie and there was no film, it was certain the Cheyenne connection had been missed and the telephones were at once put into action. No trace of Buckwalter could be found and the discouraging news was received that there was a continuous downpour of rain between Laramie and Denver.

Freeborough put out a sign announcing that the films would not arrive and the show for the night was off. The main street was crowded with people waiting to see if the auto would actually save the show and many who had apparently lost their bets were unwilling to give up. About 8 o'clock the situation was quite tense. Suddenly there was a dazzling glare of light far up the road that leads down the mountain from Tie Siding. The lights seemed altogether too bright for an auto, but there was nothing else that could be coming down that way. They came nearer with astonishing speed and at just five minutes past the hour a big Packard car covered with mud and dripping with rain came tearing up to the Princess Theater and within five minutes the place was packed to the doors and the show began.

The writer talked with Buckwalter and learned that the trip from Denver to Cheyenne had been delayed on account of passing through seven rain belts, in each of which the heavens seemed to spill over. At times the car was driven over seventy miles an hour, but more frequently it was necessary to slow down to pass through pools of water two or three feet deep.

Cheyenne was reached at 5:20, too late to catch the train, of course. Then it was necessary to start west across the mountains over a road entirely unmarked by signs or directions and over which Buckwalter had never before driven. The best previous record between Cheyenne and Laramie was three hours, but this was cut down by almost fifteen minutes.

After resting an hour Buckwalter started back to Cheyenne that night and reached there in exactly three hours. Next morning he started for Denver and just below the village of Pierce he was caught in a cloudburst that ripped things very badly. But in spite of everything the big car was driven through to Denver.

All this brings me to the point I want to make and that is the difference between the old way of running an exchange and giving the exhibitor no thought and the new way of sparing no expense or effort to take care of the showman. In this instance the express company was probably at fault in failing to properly route a shipment.

A further point I want to make is that in my report on the value of the theater I was sent to inspect I specifically called attention to the fact that the value of the place is greatly augmented by the "service" in addition to the films received from the Denver office. When an exchange will protect a customer voluntarily in this manner it adds a very material sum to the value of the show and this I certainly did not overlook.

Buckwalter himself did not look on the performance as anything particularly unusual, although the distance covered was 360 miles. He said to me in Laramie that night, "We had a helluva ride and blew out a couple of tires, but we saved the show—and that's what we are here for. But I'd like to have a few minutes' quiet conversation in a locked room with the express messenger who carried the shipment through Cheyenne last night."

So far as I can learn the express messenger refuses to be a party to the conversation—and I don't blame him.

Letters of an Old Exhibitor to a New Film Maker

Saratoga Springs, July 20, 1911.

Dear ———: You would make no mistake, old man, if you took a few pictures up here before the snow flies. The crystal clearness of air and light I spoke of in my last letter should help you wonderfully. I wish I could describe its soft and ambient charm. I might then have hopes of tempting you. Do you know, I think it is, as a rule, bad to have just one man in control when it comes to the making of pictures and the staging and the selection of plots. Think a bit and see whether the same things do not always occur in the makes of certain makers. I will mention one who injects certain notions and certain scenes into almost every one of his films. If I tell you that he loves processions and railroad trains and stations in endless iteration; that, in the domestic scenes, at least one man washes himself before he sits down to dinner or supper; that poplicemen and police stations are dragged in by the hair, so to speak, can you guess his name? That sort of thing, if persisted in, will cheapen your work. Suit the pictures to the facts of your story, the other way will not please. Don't get away with the idea that a good actor or a good actress will give you prestige without a competent stage director. The actors are the means to the end and not the end.

Oh, what a lot of "Don'ts" there are in this business you have embarked in. If you are ambitious—and most of you film makers are—remember that more than ambition is needed. I know you are not satisfied to bring up the rear of the procession, I know you want to play a part of importance in filmdom. Now then, patronize the library a little more. If we poor exhibitors, who are only purveyors at second hand, have to study, to "read up and call in the aids of education and the advice of experts, you film makers should all be scholars, or have scholars working for you, when it comes to the production of an educational film or to the proper presentation of a literary or historical subject. Right here you can show superiority by keeping a comfortable distance ahead of your competitors who do not seem to quite realize this fact, though it is as plain on the film horizon as it possibly can be. Turn out something, that will be perfect in every detail, if it pretends to be a film of the kind that I have mentioned.

Do not, my dear old friend, be led away by the present mania of over-production. It takes time to produce a good film and takes about a thousand per cent. more time for a new than for an old film maker. If you turn out one fair picture a week do all you can to make it good. Then keep on improving until it is as nearly perfect as possible and even your competitors will begin to speak well of your work. Then wait, look around carefully and watch market conditions before you think of bringing out another weekly release, and you will outlast the reckless competitor who has not studied the art of waiting.

I used to see the evidences of haste in films and they always gave me pain. All exhibitors see this sort of thing at a glance and they certainly do not like it. Perhaps we are helping the evil along by the silly first-run delusion and the daily change fetich. It's an unhealthy condition and cannot last without injury to picture quality.

I think this is about all for the hammer work to-day, I know you don't mind, you have often told me you wanted criticism and I believe you. You are not like Gil Blas and the Archbishop, I'll tell you that story the next time I see you. Just one little suggestion in the shape of a question: Why has Victor Hugo's "Notre Dame" never been filmed? Would not that be a fine subject? I have a little list of them which I will give you in homœopathic doses as I go along.

The program for to-night is an old-fashioned chicken dinner out at Lake Lonely and I would not miss that without a better excuse than burdening the mails with advice to a second-rate filmer like yourself. The hors d'oeuvres are corn on the cob from the farm, celery, tomatoes (fixed in a special Saratoga way), lettuce and honey. That will do until the next time. O. E.

Education and Science

Those of our readers who are interested in the progress of cine-education will learn with pleasure that at a meeting of the Royal Geographical Society, in London, Captain G. C. Rawling, in giving a lecture descriptive of the work of an Expedition to Dutch New Guinea, exhibited a number of interesting films of the principal scenes and incidents witnessed by the explorer. Included in the series were views of pigmies in their native haunts, making fire by rubbing two sticks together, shooting with bows and arrows, or bartering with the white man for beads and cloth. Following upon this, pictures were shown of the taller races of New Guinea—which, by the way, is the largest unknown area of land in the world—when they were taking their first bath with soap, indulging in ceremonial dances, clubbing a boar to death and calling their womenfolk to wail over the carcass. The life history of a dug-out canoe was also pictured, from the time when the tiny native axe was applied to the huge tree trunk to the moment of launching, and its departure down the river on its first voyage. One of the most interesting pictures was of Captain Rawling holding two smiling ebony babies in his arms.

The pictures were often taken under great difficulties, though it is interesting to note that the natives did not exhibit the slightest fear of the camera. In spite of bribes—such as axes, beads and cloth—the women could not be prevailed upon to "pose" for their pictures, and retired precipitately upon the appearance of the white men. Undoubtedly the pictures are of the highest value, and as they were exhibited before such an important body as the Royal Geographical Society, this will be effectively realized.

The lecture, which was followed throughout with the closest attention by a large and enthusiastic audience, was of a most interesting nature, and the films themselves were well received. It is most gratifying to those who are believers in the value of the cinematograph as an educative medium to receive such encouraging reports of the advance already made in this direction.

A lecture was given a few days ago in Berlin by Herr Otfied von Hanstein on "Cinematography and Education." After dealing with the various subjects in which the lecturer considered it was desirable use should be made of the bioscope, Herr von Hanstein passed on to the construction of theaters suitable for dealing with large numbers of children at one time. He also mentioned that in Pankow a theater has just been erected suitable for teaching the children of three large schools. (3,000 children.)

IF IT WERE TRUE? (Educational)

In all acting, realism is demanded, but it must stop short, even as by a breath, of the real; it must be realistic without being real. How paradoxical this seems, and yet how true! With what breathless suspense the beholder watches the development of the plot; the accident, the murder, the suicide—will it take place? No! Morality forbids; it is a life portrayal; it is full of lessons; it is intended to benefit the beholder with the terrible results of what might be, but what must not be; it must stop short even by a hair's breadth from the real.

How often have parents found it necessary to calm the fears of their children when following the story in the picture, by assurance of "make believe" and that "it will end all right." The seeming inevitable result will not follow, and it does not follow that the young mind besides being relieved has learned lessons in realisms and their value.

The plot, the imagination, the suggestion, the acting is only successful as it approaches nearest the real and the true, without actually being completely either real or true.

What if it were true? Some sad lessons have been learned here; sometimes it has proved sadly true; the plunge in the water has proved a drowning; the finger on the trigger has fired the shot; the sword was wielded with too strong a thrust, the locomotive ran an inch too far; the life-saving net gave way, and that which was not to happen actually occured under a momentum which could not hold the breath or stay at the hair's breadth—and it became real. Real and horrible, a life portrayal and a death portrayal, teaching the sad lesson of fatalism in realism. It is thus lessons are learned and experience gained; it is here carefulness and wisdom drive away carelessness and thoughtlessness; the actor becomes the master in his profession, thrilling the audience with alternate fears and hopes; arousing their wonder so that imagination transcends knowledge—it will not happen! Yet it may. The successful artist, while fired with vitality of his art, is yet under strong control, and the tragic ending is averted, the last breath is not breathed; that last hair-breadth is not crossed; it was real to the last degree, but—it was not true.

A HARD TASK.

For the last few weeks the writer has continued his accustomed attendance upon the moving picture, carrying with him as ever his "educational field" eyes searching for anything and everything helpful, if not valuable, to the cause in which he is most interested.

It cannot fail to be proved that the intelligent public soon meets the requirements of that which makes even some of the best pictures of permanent value. In the original theater it is not difficult to remember the interesting plays or to enumerate those which have in any way helped even if only in moral value. The numerous short and similar pictures make one feel like a voracious cheap novel reader. How gladly welcome are some of the longer subjects covering two or more reels; may their number be largely increased, for it is undoubtedly from them that greater benefits and satisfaction shall be derived.

It has, however, proved a hard task to detect many that show their appreciation of and give their support to those places where to see sufficient of the good and best for the pleasure of remembering the same is not a hard task.

Music for the Picture

By CLARENCE E. SINN

I WAS beginning to feel lonesome. No letters from anybody; no questions, no suggestions, no kicks, "no nothin'." The hiatus is probably due to the hot weather; at least we can pretend it is that. And the summer season doesn't carry with it any particular incentive for extra thinking on the part of those fortunate (or unfortunate) enough to be working just now. Most of those with whom I have conversed seem willing to quit thinking about pictures and all appertaining thereto as soon as the nightly show is over, and don't care to read, write or talk of picture music. So I was wondering whether I would stall along and mark time or crawl in a hole and pull the hole in after me until somebody woke up (myself in particular), when along comes a soothing little message from a party by the name of Johnson—up in Minnesota where the Johnsons flourish. He says in part: "I am both a piano player and operator; have been in the moving picture business over five years and owe much to the Moving Picture World. Your department I find interesting enough so far as it goes, but you don't go far enough. The "Trouble Department" every week gives us something of practical value—something which we can apply to our daily work, or something which comes within our daily experience. In the answers to correspondents we find things continually which meet our needs. Many times I find questions which I had thought of submitting, but before I get around to it somebody else asks them and I get the answer without the trouble of writing. It seems to me that if you would enlarge your department in some way and get in more information that would be of general use, it would be of more practical benefit all around."

Ouch! Right below the belt. Mr. Johnson says he is both a piano player and operator; a good double. He doesn't tell us whether or not he works at both at the same time. Probably not. I agree with him as to the value of Mr. Richardson's department, and if I was an operator I would no doubt be better able to appreciate its services, but there are reasons why this page does not cover its subject with the same thoroughness of detail. One of the least of these is embodied in the correspondent's letter. By his own showing he is too negligent to ask for information for himself, but waits for someone else to "save him the trouble." I have always expressed myself as being willing to answer anything so far as lay in my power, so if anything is worrying you let us hear about it; if I cannot offer any practical suggestions there are probably some among the constituents who can. While Mr. Richardson has laid his work in a virgin field and has probably had to dig out for himself the answers to the many problems connected therewith, I believe they are largely mechanical—or at least capable of mechanical demonstration. When an operator has his troubles they are likely to stay with him until he discovers a way to rectify them or some one helps him out. The little things which may puzzle a musician in following a picture are usually so ephemeral in character as to be impossible of more than a general description, are incapable of being bound by any given rules or commented upon in any but a general way. They are here today and gone tomorrow, seldom occurring twice exactly alike. But for all that, we have hopes of getting things on a more practical basis than they now are. Come again, Mr. Johnson—glad to hear from you; besides I think you have something up your sleeve.

I took a little jaunt last week among some of the smaller towns in the vicinity of Chicago, and judging from what I heard, the musical accompaniment to the picture has much room for improvement. In one town particularly (Harvard, Ill.), though the pianist was an excellent one, she did not rise to her opportunities. They were showing among other pictures "The Witch and the Cowboys" (American), which contains splendid chances for musical development. It abounds in weird scenes, contrasted with those of agitated, lively and pathetic character and altogether is such a one as the average pianist likes to work up into a "showy" picture, yet this lady was contented to play waltzes, two-steps and "popular" stuff all through. The music fits the picture about as well as a shirt would fill a wheelbarrow.

I want to call your attention to a recent release, "The Call of the Song" (Imp), with special music, vocal as well as instrumental. It will be worth your while to follow the suggestions as outlined by the producers of this picture and you will find the results will more than repay you for the little extra trouble.

"The Pied Piper of Hamelin" (Thanhouser) calls for a peculiar sound effect (that of the pipes), difficult to obtain in most places. Those fortunate enough to have a flute, clarinet or violin in the orchestra will let that instrument play a lively minor strain unaccompanied by the piano in the piper's scenes. An organ will answer the purpose, but if this is used, play a melody without accompaniment to imitate the pipes. Something weird and rather lively—a minor key preferably.

A friend showed me a copy of the Moving Picture World, issue of July 22d, and said: "How is this? You have been classifying the motion picture as pantomime, and here is an article (by Mr. Sargent) which declares it is not." I don't think it requires any comment from me, but if my friend thought a discrepancy existed others might do so as well. I am arguing from an entirely different standpoint. Speaking of the technique of the photoplay compared with the technique of the pantomime there may be many points of dissimilarity. I am not prepared to discuss that. I have chosen to consider the moving picture from the standpoint of its accompanying music as pantomime. There is nothing to argue about; all we are concerned with is the dramatic action and the descriptive music appropriate to that action. The technique of play building (or photoplay building) is another story.

In England a musical text book for moving picture pianists has recently been issued. The selections include grand marches or funeral processions, choral music, quick marches, Oriental music, agitators for pursuits, for quarreling and duel scenes, for combat, for death scenes, battle music, pastorale, country dance, peasant dance, gavotte, minuet, Hungarian Czardas, Spanish dances, Chinese music, lullabies, baby music, coquettish music, pathetic music, mysterious music, for reconciliation scenes, pleading music, for drinking scenes, for festive scenes, heavy dramatic music, storm music, American Indian music, etc.

Kissing the Blarney Stone.

Though much has been said about "kissing the Blarney Stone," few know of the difficulty of this feat. The accompanying engraving is from a photograph taken while Miss Gene Gauntier, assisted by the members of the O'Kalem company, accomplished the trick. Miss Gauntier claims the honor of having kissed that famous stone three times.

Projection Department

Talk on Operators' Salaries.

There are very many managers who honestly believe they are making money by paying a low salary to the operator. A dollar saved is a dollar made, they argue, entirely forgetting the equally applicable adage: "Save at the spigot, lose at the bunghole."

Many managers playing to capacity business demand low priced operators. We play to capacity anyhow, say they; so why pay good salary for excellence in the operating room? As the matter stands they are correct. However, it might occur to such a one that if he can play to capacity with mediocre projection he could, beyond question, obtain higher admission prices by putting on a better projection.

"But," say you, "the higher price is no guarantee of improvement in projection." True. Consider this, however. High class projection, in all the term implies, requires not only close application on the part of the operator, but it also means the use of brains; and there lies the crux of the whole matter. You employ ordinary workmen to do day's labor and over them you place a foreman. You pay that foreman a considerably better salary than the workmen. Why? His work is easier, why more pay? Simply because you expect of him the application of brain power, at least to some extent; also there is responsibility attached. You employ an architect and expect to and do pay liberally. Why? Because you profit through his training and his brainwork. In fact, it is thus in everything. The moment training and brains are brought into play they must be paid for liberally; also the higher the quality of brains, and the more perfect the training, the higher the remuneration demanded. But it almost invariably pays to pay the price.

It is a fact, recognized by all but the most obtuse, that poor projection operates to cut down the income of any house. It is also a recognized fact that superior projection will increase the income of any theater. It is a fact that the whole investment represented by any moving picture house is dependent on what comes from the operating room. It is a fact that thousands of theaters are inflicted with mediocre projection for the simple reason that the rediculously low salaries paid have operated to make the profession of operating anything but desirable to men of mature years, who have the necessary qualifications to put forth artistic projection; moreover, it is in the nature of things that a man is not going to put forth the same effort, except in rare cases, when working for fifteen dollars a week that he would were he receiving thirty or forty. Nobody cares very strenuously for the fifteen dollar job anyhow. He can earn that at almost anything, so why worry about losing it?

It is quite true that high salaries cannot be paid in very small towns. It is also true that fifteen dollars in the small town is usually equal to fully twice that sum in the city. The writer is a firm believer in the very best of everything in the operating room. He is absolutely positive that it is a good financial investment to pay at least thirty dollars a week for an operator, demanding however, thirty dollar service therefor. He is no believer in the fifteen dollar man in charge of the operating room, whence comes the projection on which is dependent the income on from $5,000 to $50,000 investment. You will observe that I have set this forth not as a plea for the operator, but as a straight business proposition from beginning to end, and by no means infer that the instant jumping of salaries would immediately better projection to any large degree. A gradual raising of operators' salaries will, however, beyond any question of doubt, operate to attract to the business higher class men—men of greater natural ability and better training. It will force the men (and boys) at present engaged in a business of which they know little or nothing, to get exceedingly busy or to retire from the field in favor of others who will. A two dollar pair of trousers is a pair of trousers—true; but a five dollar pair is usually worth more than the difference by comparison. The sketch below, sent in by C. Christiani, Washington, D. C., aptly illustrates a day in the life of the cheap operator.

An Elegant Mess.—A new law has been passed by the Legislature in Albany, and is now in force and effect, making it mandatory that all applicants for license shall have served six months apprenticeship. Section 2 of the law reads: "This Act shall take effect immediately, but shall not affect or apply to existing licenses, nor to holders of existing licenses." This means that, if an operator who has had years of experience applies for license, he must be refused as he is not now a license-holder. It also means that if a New York license-holder has allowed his license to temporarily lapse at time of passage of the law he must serve six months as apprentice before being eligible to license; more concerning this later. The crux of the matter lies in the fact that the law requires a six months' apprenticeship under a licensed operator.

Good Record.—Mr. W. S. Ray, Salem, N. J., writes: "In July number of World you say there have been three aluminum curtain coating receipts published. We were Index subscribers. Will you kindly tell us how to get same, or are they contained in your handbook. Have been in the business only about five years. Have the poorest machine, but show the best projected picture within radius of eighteen miles; so acknowledged by other exhibitors; yet cannot answer one-tenth of your test questions (July 29 issue). Have had all the troubles you ever heard of and have overcome a few. Spent three years looking for remedy for that film-jump when there is a little speed on an Edison—remedy: drill one small hole in door, right over the stop on the intermittent roller, and put screw in it to hold it off the intermittent sprocket the right distance to not bear on the film."

Well, Neighbor Ray, I was somewhat amused at your letter; also interested. I have edited the department a year and a half, besides having received probably ten thousand letters in my personal mail, many of them concerning troubles. Certainly if you have "had all the troubles I have ever heard of," you have put in five pretty busy years. That you have the best projection within a radius of 18 miles is distinctly to your credit. It may, however, mean that you have very fine projection or may not; depending on what your neighbors are doing. Certainly you cannot but concede that you would be the better operator for having the knowledge necessary to answer those questions. I thank you for the suggestion in regard to the Edison machine, and pass it along to our readers.

Answers Kansas.—South Bethlehem, Pa., writes: "I note in July 29th issue that Kansas is having trouble with his Edison machine losing the lower loop. Am using this make machine, and operators in a dozen different houses who use the Edison machines had the same trouble, viz.: losing the lower loop. Many suppose that the fault lies in either the sprockets being worn, or out of line; but they are mistaken. It is nothing of the kind. Since I found a remedy I can run my machine with the lower sprocket ⅛ inch out of line and it does not make a particle of difference. The real fault is that the spring which compresses the idler is too weak, thus allowing the film to raise itself up and pull out the loop. Other operators, as well as myself, who had a strong spring substituted have no more trouble and it is the only remedy. I might mention that the lower bracket is too short, thus causing the idler to lie on the side of the sprocket instead of on top, where it should be. I trust this information may be of some value."

We are obliged to you for contributing remedy for Kansas' trouble. I remember that other operators have said the same thing concerning the lower bracket spring of the Edison machine. If I be permitted I would respectfully suggest to the Edison people that they look carefully into this matter. Probably they can make a change for the better, as I am sure they will be glad to do if anything is really wrong with that spring, or the position of the idler.

Likes the "World."—Florida (name of town suppressed) writes: "Enclosed find $1.50 for the handbook. Am constant reader of the 'World.' I note, in July 29 issue, McPherson, Kan., has trouble loosing the lower loop. I had the same difficulty with my Edison, type B, and by watching discovered that when a patch came through it raised the takeup sprocket tension roller bracket. Do you think that driving the Edison inside shutter twice around to the intermittent sprocket once would improve the picture?"

You say the patch "raises the bracket." You probably do not mean that the patch strikes the bracket, but that it raises the roller enough to let the film pull over the teeth. You do not say how you remedied the fault, if remedy it you did. The shutter could be driven at double speed, but it would then be necessary to have but one blade and that one of different width than it now is. I do not see where you would gain anything. One machine used that scheme on its old models, but, while results were fairly good, I never liked the idea very well. Would advise that you study pages 111-12-13 and 14 of the handbook, where the shutter principle is explained.

Wants Employment.—Mr. W. C. Evans, Norman, Okla., writes: "Note your refusal to assist operators in securing employment, in which I think you are unwise. You have space devoted to operators and it would not take up much to publish a man's name and address. I have had six years' experience and during that time have had no trouble securing employment. In fact, have never been out of a position more than a month during that time. Am married and can give any amount of reference. Have been out of a job but short time in this place, but, as you know, a married man must have steady work."

I have not refused to assist operators, but I do refuse to recommend men in any manner. Have gotten little thanks and much trouble nearly every time I did it. If the columns were opened to free publication of names and addresses it would require pages to fill the demand. We offered to publish bona fide "situation wanted" ads at a merely nominal rate; more than that is impractical. You are mistaken in supposing the Department to be strictly for operators. It is for operators and managers both.

Ordinance Wanted.—Wilmington, Del., writes: "You have published two or more ordinances recently, but they all seem to be more or less faulty. I believe this matter of an ordinance governing M. P. theaters and creating and governing the actions of operators' examining boards is a very live one just now. I am sure your readers would appreciate it if you would draft and publish such an ordinance as would meet your own approval."

What you ask, Wilmington, is altogether too great a task. It would consume more time than I can possibly spare. However, I can and will set forth some of the things that should by all means be taken care of in such laws.

Laws creating Boards of Examiners should cover:

(a) Not less than three members to comprise a board, none less than bona fide experience in animated picture projection; one a practical electrician, having intimate, thorough knowledge of moving picture theater wiring and all electrical appliances used in operating rooms. The remaining member may be any good, sensible man, or head of the Bureau of Electrical Inspection of the city, if one there be.

(b) Boards should be obliged to hold regular meetings at stated times, for examination of applicants, said meetings to be frequent enough to impose no hardship.

(c) Board members, except they already be salaried by the city, should receive adequate remuneration for their work.

(d) The City should provide proper room, or rooms for the use of the board, and all necessary appliances, stationery, etc.

(e) City should provide a competent stenographer, who must be present at all examinations and keep a true and correct record of same, including all questions asked and, when possible, answers received.

(f) Board should be prohibited from use of any but practical questions, "Catch" questions should be barred.

(g) Board should be obliged to report to proper City official their exact reasons for rejection of any applicant.

(h) Examinations held by less than two members of board (two members being present) should be illegal.

(i) Fee for operator's license should in no case exceed $2.00 per year.

(j) License may or may not be renewed, at expiration, without re-examination.

(k) License card should contain sealed signature and photo of owner.

(l) License may be suspended for not to exceed 60 days for violation of department rules or laws on second offense may be revoked. All applicants shall appear in person and register, giving residence where mail is received, name, nationality, age, previous experience as operator. Latter may be required to be sworn to.

(m) Board shall either examine immediately (within two hours of application) operators holding license cards, still in force, from other cities or States, or in lieu thereof, issue temporary permit to work until examination may be given in regular course. If temporary permit is issued he shall be immediately revoked in event of failure to pass satisfactory examination later.

(n) Failure to pass should debar candidates for license from further examination for six months.

(o) No person under 21 years of age should be eligible to license.

(p) Habitual use of intoxicants or cigarettes should debar from license.

(q) All applicants for license should be required to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that they have had not less than one year's actual experience as operator, or as apprentice under competent operator.

The foregoing is somewhat hastily compiled and some points doubtless have been overlooked. However, what it sets forth I consider necessary points to be cared for in the drafting of an ordinance creating a board of examiners and governing their actions. As to a law designed to take care of the matter of operating rooms and their equipment, it should say that

(1) No operating room may have less than 50 square feet of floor surface, or be less than seven feet, in the clear, from floor to ceiling at any point.

(2) All operating rooms shall have a vent flue of not less than 1½ square inches area to each square foot of floor area, same to extend from the ceiling, or a point near the ceiling, to the open air, above the roof if possible; provided, however, that no vent need exceed 360 square inches in area.

(3) All operating rooms shall be of such fireproof construction as is approved by the National Board of Fire Underwriters or the City Fire Marshall.

(4) Every operating room shall have a door, opening outward, not less than 2 x 6 feet in size, provided with an appropriate spring to hold same shut.

(5) Every opening from operating room into auditorium, except door, shall be equipped with a metal shutter, sliding in grooves and semi-automatic in action. Same shall be so arranged that all shutters are held open by a single cotton master cord passing directly over front edge of upper magazine of each machine, just high enough to clear operator's head when standing. Shutters may close by their own weight or by force of a spring. Failure of any shutter to close when tested by inspector shall automatically operate to assess a fine of fifty dollars against the owner of the theater and suspend the operator's license for a period of thirty days. Inspector shall be required to have both operator and manager present when shutters are tested, and these shall be made at least once in 30 days. If vent flue is provided with damper it shall be so weighted that it will normally stand open and shall only be held shut by cord attached to master shutter cord before mentioned.

(6) Front, sides and top of every lamp-house shall be tightly enclosed, except for vent-holes, protected by wire gauze screen, but back of lamp-house may be open.

(7) All moving picture projection machines shall be equipped with approved upper and lower magazines, doors of which shall be closed when machine is running.

(8) All rheostats shall be located outside the operating room, but low voltage transformers (inductors, economizers, etc.), used to control the current may be located inside the room.

(9) No wire of less size than No. 6 B & S gauge shall be used in any projection arc circuit.

(10) Only link fuses, enclosed in suitable metal cabinet with spring door, shall be allowed in any operating room.

(11) All wires, except asbestos covered from outlet to lamps, shall be in conduits.

(12) All switches shall be enclosed.

(13) All carbon butts shall be deposited, immediately on removal from lamp, in metal can containing water.

(14) All films shall be kept in solderless metal case with approved spring-closing cover, or door.

(15) Smoking shall be absolutely prohibited inside the operating room.

(16) There shall be no reading matter inside any operating room. Reading matter to be construed to mean newspapers, novels, etc., but not including catalogues, or books of instruction, or magazines helpful to the operator in his work.

(17) Not to exceed one ounce of alcohol or one pint of lubricating oil shall be allowed in the operating room. Benzine, kerosene and like substances shall not be kept in any quantity in any theater.

(18) Machines may be motor driven provided their circuit be connected through a platform not to exceed 1½ feet wide by 3 feet long, located on the right (operator's), side of the machine and so arranged on springs that it will require 100 pounds weight to complete the circuit, the contact and springs to be closed in and sealed by the city electrician. Evidence of tampering with this circuit shall suspend operator's license for 30 days for first offense, 60 days for the second and revoke license forever for third offense.

(19) All machines shall be firmly and effectively anchored to the floor.

Some of the provisions of the foregoing may seem strange at first glance. I have laid stress on the vent flue and shutters for the reason that they settle the whole fire proposition, if the room be properly fireproofed. With an ample vent flue and shutters that really WORK, reels of film can burn and the audience will never know of it. The draft would be in, not out, and neither fire nor smoke would appear in the auditorium. For a long time I have been considering the motor question. The trouble with motor-drive lies in the fact that many operators simply WILL NOT attend to business when they have a motor. They "let George (the motor) do it" while they are rubbering out of a window, reading, or tinkering at something, instead of sitting by the machine with their eye glued on the screen, as they should. The projection INVARIABLY SUFFERS. By setting a platform (it need not be more than three inches high) beside the machine, supporting it on springs so that it requires the weight of the operator to close the motor circuit contact, he will have to remain on that platform beside the machine The scheme is entirely practical and would remove my objection to the motor. I would be only too pleased to see the operator released from the eternal crank twisting if he can be compelled to stay right there beside the machine where he belongs. Not all operators neglect their projection because they have a motor-driven machine, but the temptation is always present, and very many of them yield, to some extent at least. With the spring platform he can't, for the instant he steps off it the motor stops. The platform would not inconvenience the man who does as he should do, in the least, and it would make the fellow who is careless stick right there where he belongs.

Exhibitor in Serious Trouble.—Mr. W. A. Ryan, Deer River, Minnesota, writes: "I am in trouble and need help. Question: How am I going to get it? I don't find anything in the Projection Department that fits my case. I have been taking the Moving Picture World practically from the time of its birth, but have never run onto a case just like mine.

"I started a moving picture show in this town almost two years ago. At that time I was charged a license of twenty dollars per year. Then, at the following spring election, our council was somewhat changed, and some of the new members got it into their heads that I was making a lot of money (and in a town of one thousand population). Well, the outcome was, they raised the license to two hundred dollars a year. I paid at this rate for six months, when I discovered the ordinance did not appear to be legal, whereupon I refused to pay such a rate. The council had me arrested and brought before the village justice of the peace. I employed a lawyer, and at the trial it was found that the warrant was useless. I was discharged. The council made a new ordinance which they intended to be iron-clad as far as our little show was concerned. I paid fifty dollars for the first three months under this ordinance and wrote on the face of the check that the amount was paid under protest. Council refused to grant license because I did not pay for the previous three months when I claim there was no ordinance covering my show. They ordered me to not open again under penalty of arrest and prosecution, but I never closed the door for a single night. I was arrested again. Justice held that the ordinance was not good and discharged me again. Council got busy and were making preparations to arrest me again, when I went to the county seat and secured a restraining order preventing the council from interfering with me or my business until he should decide the legality of the ordinance. Our lawyers went into the case very thoroughly, I think; had the briefs of the case all prepared, and the judge was to decide the case before last spring election, but for some reason returned the case to be passed upon by Judge Stanton. Then the building in which my lawyers had their rooms burned, and all the papers were destroyed, so that we were forced to start all over again. I now expect a decision to be rendered in August. In the meantime, I have been compelled to put up more money for lawyers' fees, bonds, etc., than I can stand. But if I can get help in any way from the moving picture fraternity, I am reasonably sure that I shall win out. But I know that my lawyer's bill will be more than I can stand, and unless such aid is forthcoming, it will put me out of business. I thought if this matter was brought to the attention of the moving picture people that they would be interested enough to want to see the matter thoroughly threshed out, and would be willing to help. This little matter of mine would, I think, establish a precedent whereby other moving picture people would be able to know just where they are at. I know if it were someone else that was putting up the fight that I would be more than willing to contribute my portion. Do you know of anything in the motion picture fraternity that one can turn to in this particular kind of distress? If I am able to fight this out and win, which I think I shall, I shall be only too glad to have the Moving Picture World herald the glad tidings abroad, because it might help some other brother in like distress."

I can sympathize with you, Brother Ryan. You are not the first one confronted with unreasonable, tyrannous legislation by small-town councils. Plainly you deeply insulted the august members of your village law-making body by refusing to humbly bow to their dictates, regardless of whether the said dictates were reasonable and right, or quite the reverse. Your council is attempting to exact precisely the same license fee charged by Chicago, a city of close to 3,000,000 people. The proposition of paying $200 yearly license in a town of 1,000 is utterly absurd and ridiculous. Moreover, the attempt to assess it is outrageous; also it is unquestionably unconstitutional from the fact that it is in effect confiscatory. I do not believe you can pay that fee, put on a decent show and continue in business, in a town of that size. It is the duty of the council to assess a fair, reasonable fee to the end that you pay your just portion of the expenses of government. If the idea of those new councilmen holds good, that if you are making money the license fee should be raised, then it follows that, were you making a million dollars a year they could and should charge you $900,000 or more a year license. In line with their argument, if you have a bank in Deer River it probably ought to pay $2,000 or more annual license. It is a real pity that such a town cannot be deprived absolutely of all amusement. Your show is probably about all a village of 1,000 has in the way of regular entertainment. Apparently they don't want even that.

But the moral I want to point out in this matter is that if there were an effective exhibitors' State organization, of which you were a member, there would be ample funds for just such a fight. You are now reaping the direct result of lack of organization. You are compelled to rely upon the more or less doubtful aid of individual exhibitors, who mostly have plenty of troubles of their own, instead of being backed by a solid State organization. I have given your full address that any who will may offer financial aid direct.

Failed to pass.—A New York exhibitor writes saying that he recently took the examination for operator's license, in order that he might be able to relieve his operator, presumably for meals, etc. Says he learned from his operator and by studying and experimenting. He sends in a letter from the Department stating that he failed to pass because he did not know the proper use of fuses and did not take necessary precautions before connecting current to lamp. Asks what is the proper procedure, presumably meaning procedure to obtain license, and proper answer to the things wherein he failed.

First and foremost, let me say that, while I do not know who your operator may be, I do know that very many men hold cards in the city of New York who are sadly lacking in practical or theoretical knowledge concerning their profession and therefore would make anything but good teachers. To learn operating you must study electrical action and electrical appliance, as well as projection; also know something of optics, and understand the motion picture mechanism. You say that, among other things, you have studied my handbook. The handbook is designed for operators. It will help the beginner, but not teach him the business. Before connecting to the lamp you should have tested the line voltage and seen to it that there was proper resistance, that the wires were all large enough, that all joints and connections were properly made and tight, that your fuses were in place and of proper voltage and size; that the switches were of proper voltage and size and that the lamp was in usable condition. Fuses are for the purpose of automatically protecting the wires, etc., from overload.

Camera Man.—Winbume, Pa., writes: "Am manager of M. P. theater. Would like to secure position with M. P. company as camera man. Am practical commercial photographer, ten years' experience; age 33. Have made specialty of parade work, motion work and quick finishing for the trade. My combined knowledge of photography, together with my business ability should entitle me to a chance to make good somewhere in the film world. Can you suggest possible method of reaching the proper people?"

An ad. in The World might answer. However, the better method is to personally visit or correspond with the producers, setting forth your claims clearly and concisely. Frankly, the only way to secure a desirable position at anything, unless you have a known record is to hustle for it. I never wait for something I want to "turn up." I proceed, with my little pick, to turn it up. It may turn hard, but it's got to come if I want it, or the handle of the pick will get busted right then and there. Go thou and do likewise.

I. A. T. S. E. Convention.—The I. A. T. S. E., with which motion picture operators' unions of America are affiliated, has just held its convention in Rochester, N. Y. The convention polled 217 votes, of which the operators cast but about 25. This is a cause for complaint in many quarters, operators pointing out the fact that they are at the mercy of stage employees and spot-light men, owing to the great preponderance of their voting strength. Not satisfied with this, one delegate, Otto Bahn, Local Union 77, introduced a resolution stipulating that operators' unions, whether separately chartered locals or auxiliaries, be limited to one delegate in conventions, regardless of their numerical strength. The committee on resolutions had the nerve to recommend its adoption, but, to the credit of the convention, it was turned down. A resolution compelling the election of a motion picture operator as one of the seven vice-presidents was killed, the claim being made that it was "class legislation." A resolution granting New York operators, now organized as auxiliary to I. A. T. S. E. local union No. 35, a separate charter, was not adopted. In fact, the operators do not appear to have fared as well as they might in the convention. Just what the outcome of the refusal of a separate charter to the New York operators will be is somewhat of a problem at this time. The feeling in the auxiliary is rather bitter.

Citizenship, Elizabeth, N. J., asks: "Is it necessary to be a citizen of the United States to procure a license in Boston? Is there an operators' union in that city and is there any fee or examination necessary to joining?"

I believe Massachusetts has no citizenship law, that par-

Sensible Letter.—Mr. R. W. Freeland, Mgr. Gem Theater, Harbor Springs, Mich., in a mighty neatly typewritten letter on beautifully tinted paper sporting a letterhead that is strictly up-to-date, writes:

"Would it be possible for you, through the 'Projection Department,' to call the attention of those managers and operators guilty of the following crimes to their need of reform? First:—Managers expecting their operators to obtain first-class results with old, wornout film; expecting them to rewind one reel while projecting another. Make patches with one hand and make them right. To make satisfactory patches on all kinds of film with only one kind of cement."

"The operator:—Making patches with one hand while running machine with the other is out of all reason. Refuse to do so! Acetone, acetic ether, equal parts, and enough N. I. film that the emulsion has been removed from, make a good cement for N. I. film. Banana oil, two parts, and acetic ether, one part, is the best we know for ordinary stock. Take all film which you are going to use and run it off your rewinds into a box. Examine every inch of it as you pull it off. See that every patch is solid and is in frame. Trim any broken place which you think will not need cutting out. Be on the job early. Take as much interest in the place as if you were the owner. Talk things over with your boss when things go wrong instead of with some outsider. One thing more: watch that take-up tension, as it is the real cause of more films being in such bad condition than all other things combined.

"Managers:—Help your operator to put his reels in first class condition. If you do not know how to make a patch get busy and learn. I claim that no man is a real manager until he can step into the operating room and do the work that he demands from any first-class operator. Your operator is just plain flesh and blood the same as you. He will do his best if you give him decent encouragement. It s up to you. Treat him as you would like to be treated. If anything about the work can be improved, talk it over with him in a quiet tone of voice, but be sure you know what you are talking about. This is where being an operator comes in. Did you get that, Mr. Near-Manager? Now, don't get mad; but learn, if only a little each day, something about operating.

"Service:—$1.00 per reel will get you service, but what kind and in what condition will it be? Get good service even if it does cost a few cents more. If one exchange fails to do as they agreed to, try another, but do not expect to get something for nothing. After the last show rush every film you are through with to the express office. Remit promptly. Take the best possible care of the film. Keep it in a cool place when not in use and see that it is carefully packed for shipment when same is made."

I have mentioned Neighbor Freeland's letter-paper, etc., for the reason that it indicated thoroughness in all he does. What he says is just plain sense, which may well be read and pondered by a very large percentage of our exhibitors and operators. In the business are some real, live, up-and-coming managers, who have been at pains to learn as completely as possible every detail of the business. They are hustlers and hard workers, of course. Unfortunately, however, we also have with us, in somewhat considerable number, the near-manager. He knows that the admission price is five (or ten cents), that there ought to be seats in the auditorium, a ticket box, a screen and a machine in every well-regulated theater. He also knows how to say "speed 'er up" and "cut out one reel, while the crowd lasts" and "this way out, please." What he doesn't know would fill volumes. To him a picture is a picture, provided it doesn't climb clear off the screen. When he is employing an operator his first question is not: "What do you know about projection?" No; nothing so foolish. His first query, and probably his last one, too, if the reply be not satisfactory is: "How cheap will you work?" This type of manager knows a lot about operating. Dear me, yes! He knows the machine has a crank and cog-wheels, and that they go 'round. Possessed of a fund of projection lore, he, of course, doesn't hesitate to tell his operator exactly what to do. To him, $15 is a tremendous sum to pay out every week for an operator. Twelve he considers not bad, but ten is his ideal. Think of it! Placing the entire show, upon which depends the income of the house, in the hands of a ten to fifteen dollar man! Can absurdity go further? Care for the film? What? Neither he nor his cheap "operator" knows or cares anything about that item. Tell him or his bargain-day operator to keep the film in a cool place and they'd probably ask you: "Whaffor?" Mind you, I am not condemning all operators who work cheap, as incompetents. I am condemning the operator who thinks more about securing the "job" than about the salary secured, and the manager who places cheapness ahead of competency. I am condemning the operator who has to work cheap because he doesn't know his business and who is making no serious effort to perfect himself therein. I am condemning the manager who knows practically nothing about the projection and is making no serious effort to secure knowledge. I disagree with friend Freeland to the exent that I do not consider it necessary that the manager be a practical operator. It is absolutely necessary, however, that he be a competent, critical judge of results on the screen. It is absolutely imperative that the manager know what constitutes perfection in curtain results, else he is in no position to compel his operator to produce them.

Corrects Editor.—Mt. Jewett, Pa., writes: "On page 209, July 29th issue, is an error, though whether intentional, a misprint or what I cannot say. In answering "Synchronism" you say that sixty cycle current alternates 7,200 times per second. This is entirely wrong, since 60 cycle only alternates 120 times per second, instead of 7,200 times, as you have it. Perhaps you recall that the rule for alternations is: Cycles per second equals alternations per minute divided by two; or, more plainly, Alt. p. m. = cycles p. s. × 2. And perhaps you remember that one cycle equals ½ alternation, and 60 cycle current per second equals 60 x 60, or 3,600 cycles per m., which multiplied by two gives 7,200 alternations per minute. I hope the mistake in "Synchronism" is merely a misprint and not a lack of knowledge."

A careful reading of the article in question will, I believe, show that I wrote "second" meaning minute. It was an error, of course. I believe, however, Friend Mt. Jewett, that you may well look over your own rules a little. If one cycle equals one-half alternation I surely have something yet to learn. You see how easy it is to make mistakes in writing. I credit you with nothing worse than an error, since you have correctly figured out the alternations per minute. I therefore am charitable and assume the other was an error and not a lack of knowledge.

Melting Point.—St. Louis, Mo., writes: "Have had a dispute with another operator and, not knowing where else to seek the desired information in authoritative form, have decided to leave the matter to you. There is a bet of five dollars up. We were making some experiments with iron for lamp leads and the question of fusing point was mentioned between us. One claims wrought iron wire will fuse at lower temperature than will steel wire. The other says no. Which is right?"

The melting point of wrought iron is given as 3,286 Fahr. Steel is given as 3,286—the same.

Seating.—Minneapolis, Minn., asks: "My partner and I are having some difference of opinion and have decided to leave the matter to you. I favor a twenty-inch seat, with some kind of upholstering. My partner favors an eighteen-inch non-upholstered chair. Which is the better, and why?"

In my judgment you are both partly right and partly wrong. The eighteen-inch chair is too narrow to be very comfortable, particularly for such patrons as are inclined to be fleshy. The twenty-inch one is better. True, it allows of but ten chairs in a space which would accommodate eleven of the smaller chair, but, unless your seating capacity is quite limited the added comfort will, in my judgment, more

"A Country Cupid" (Biograph).—Excellent photography of daisy meadows, which sets the time as May, with country dooryards and the homely, little district school, give perfect backgrounds to this idyllic picture of the pretty school teacher's love story. The Biograph people have the happy faculty of doing this sort of thing extremely well. By a few skillfully selected sketches—the children coming to school, the little teacher on her way, the half-witted youth, shown as being strangely affected by flowers, and the school teacher's big beau—the producer has made the elements of the situation clear and made everything ready for an intensely dramatic picture.

After the preliminary statement, a scene shows the idiot with a revolver and from that point the situation develops quickly, occupying not very much more time than it takes to picture it. We know instinctively that the shaft of tragedy, as it were, is aimed at the heroine; but we don't know yet whether the idiot will attack her directly and she will be saved by the hero, or whether the idiot will get the hero at a disadvantage and she will save him. We are not left in doubt long. She is alone in the schoolhouse and the idiot comes. He enters and points the revolver at her; tells her that he intends to shoot her and himself and that both will be found together. It is not until now that the scenario writer puts in a scene showing that the hero has the letter from the school teacher making-up after a little quarrel. She had been too proud to send this, but one of her small pupils, the country cupid, had picked it out of the waste basket and mailed it. We remembered that the boy had put two cents in the R. F. D. mail-box with it so that the postman could deliver it, and naturally held that the hero lived perhaps a mile away. The hero now joyfully and very leisurely takes his way to visit his sweetheart, making friends with the children as he goes. It is plain that he never can get there in time to save her. This is the impression the scenario writer intended to give us. His way out of the difficulty was not the old, trite way. He had shown that the idiot was strangely affected by flowers and he had shown the school-teacher tossing a little bunch of flowers into the waste basket. Good, for the scenario writer! The teacher remembers the idiot's peculiarity and quickly snatching the bouquet from the basket, she holds it to the idiot. He at once forgets what he came to do. Slowly he lays down the revolver while the teacher reaches out ready to snatch it as soon as he shall have taken his hand from it on the table. He lets go and she has it. It's a fine scene, and does credit to idiot, school teacher and producer. But, and here again the scenario writer showed wisdom, the idot has no fear of the revolver and the teacher doesn't want to shoot him; he soon is snatching it from her again, but at that point the hero enters and makes the idiot spin around at a good tug on his arm. Here the scenario writer is a little weak; for measuring the time that the hero had to come to the schoolhouse in by the time the idiot spent talking to the teacher, we feel that he wouldn't have got there. If he had been shown as getting the letter and starting, immediately after we saw that the idiot had the revolver, nothing would have been lost, for he was pictured as coming very leisurely, and this ending would have been a bit more convincing.

"The Indian Girl's Sacrifice" (Kalem).—This reviewer confesses that he judges the atmosphere of early southern Californian pictures by H. H. Jackson's great romance, "Ramona." He is the more satisfied as to the righteousness of doing so by the fact that the atmosphere of this and many other good pictures is the same as that of the story of Ramona and Felipe. In this picture, though, the Indians are not friendly. The hero rescues an Indian girl and brings her to a mission school. This Indian maid later overhears a plot of a half-breed who wants to be avenged on the hero's fiancée because she does not love him, and in a very interesting scene she, dressed as a boy, kills the half-breed—it happens in a ceremony called the dagger dance and in the very way the villain was purposing to kill the fiancée's father. Then follows the scene in the church, where the Indians come demanding the supposed boy, who is now a nun. This scene faithfully pictures the Indians' reverence for the Church. The padre easily dominates the situation, shows them the culprit dressed in her black robes and calling sternly upon them to repent, continues with the mass, the Indians kneeling with the others. The one noticeable blemish in the picture is the Padre's wig—it is too plainly artificial. The conduct of the picture and the acting are clear and the backgrounds interesting. It's a very interesting picture.

"During Cherry Time" (Lubin).—The opening scene in an actress's dressing-room of this comedy impress one as having life. It is due not alone to the acting of the heroine (Florence Lawrence), and the dozen or so who support her in this scene, but to the grouping and whole layout of the scene, which are perfect. The rest of the story has a mountain resort for its background and is what may be termed a flirtation comedy, in which an actress comes between two simple lovers. Some of these scenes drag a little, but the picture takes life again when the repentant actress coaches the younger girl in flirting and dresses her up in a truly becoming harem skirt. The final scenes are lively and amusing, and the picture as a whole is a very good comedy.

"By the Aid of a Lariat" (Kalem).—The rescue of the heroine in this film by making of a lariat a bridge on which, hand over hand, she crosses a deep ravine, is a thrilling scene. It was handled a little slowly. An Indian got to the far end of the rope and could have cut it, had, in fact, to wait till he was shot. The picture was very effective, nevertheless. Perhaps it would have been more effective if the spectators could have had a clearer idea of the impassable gulf that separated the girl from her friends as soon as she herself knew that it was there. We were shown a view of the gulf, but as shown, we failed to see why she didn't ride at once across it. When the silhouette is shown, with the girl crossing, the difficulty was made very plain. There's a later scene in the picture of an Indian attack on a pioneer's prairie schooner, and a rescue by cowboys whom the girl brings back, that is also thrilling.

"The Fickle Fiancée" (Pathe).—The costumes of this colored picture appear to be Swiss, but the background of the story is not a mountainous country but a heavily wooded one. The hero is a game-keeper, finds a young woman almost fainting by the wayside and takes her home to his sister's care. Later we see that the wayfarer is the man's accepted fiancée, but is not true to him. He discovers this and dismisses her. The story is not very important, but its scenes are beautiful and its players graceful and pleasing as actors, and the conduct of the picture makes the most possible out of it.

"A Trip in the Island of Marken" (Pathe).—Few travelog pictures that we have seen have given us so much of the atmosphere and life of the places illustrated as this picture gives of the Dutch Island of Marken. It seems to be a fishing and dairy country. We see its people, grown-ups and children, living in little houses built high up, to be above the inundations, and traveling mostly in queer rowboats. We see pictures of school children, merchants with their wares, fishermen and much else of great interest. It is a very pleasing film.

"Wreck of the Federal Express" (Pathe).—Topical pictures are sure of a welcome if they come soon after the event they picture. This gives a clear idea of the results of the recent accident near Bridgeport, Conn.

"The Return of Widow Pogson's Husband" (Vitagraph).—The end of this amusing picture made even the ten o'clock morning audience at Keith & Proctor's Union Square house laugh; it laughed apparently as a whole. That scene was a fitting ending and it doubtless seemed very convincing to the audience. The comedy is wisely laid-out, but would have been a little more effective if, when Pogson started off, we hadn't seen him leaving the delicatessen store No. 1620. It happened that after a year or two had passed and the "widow" was being courted again, Pogson comes back to Brooklyn, and one of the suitors, not knowing him, hires him to burglarize the "widow's" house so that he can rescue her. Pogsen enters his old house as a burglar, yet is surprised to find that the woman is his wife. The comedy as a whole is very amusing and commendable, and some of the scenes are very funny indeed.

"The Bewildered Baker" (Kalem).—Perhaps it was ten tramps who apparently hid hemselves in the baker's basket. The baker found the basket heavy to drag. He saw one tramp peeping out and called a copper. The copper found the basket empty and went away. Then all ten climbed out one after the other and escaped. It is amusing in a mild way as clever trick films are apt to be.

"Sky Pilot" (Vitagraph).—Love, generosity and forgiveness are largely dealt with in this well-conducted but rather complicated picture of Alaska in winter. It has the usual qualities of Vitagraph Alaskan pictures, including good acting, interesting dog-sleds, Indians and snowy mountains. The photography is somewhat below the standard of this company in one or two of the scenes, especially in one showing four tepees, it is very poor. But the story is very interesting and also instructive. Its atmosphere is very religious; there's an effective picture of a conversion and one of an Alaskan funeral in it. One very small fault is noticeable. The sky pilot falls overcome and is snowed under, is found by Indians, rescued and taken to the tepees, but he nevertheless comes out of the tepee a day or so later with a fresh white collar and cuffs.

"As Fate Decreed" (Pathe).—Here is an emotional film which will cause the audience to become immediately sympathetic. A young monk wearies of the restricted life of the monastery and escapes. He marries, enters business and is prosperous for a time. But reverses come and after his property, his friends and ultimately his child are taken away he staggers back to the monastery, a broken man, and falls dead at the feet of an image of Christ.

"Caught in the Act" (Selig).—The very fact that the roots of the situation pictured in this film, which came from a bystander's misunderstanding of a roadside tragedy enacted by a motion picture company, were also hidden from the spectators keeps them wondering what it is all about till the end in a police court, when the villain or hero or somebody hands the justice a card of a moving picture man. By that time every one has forgotten the predicament of the unhappy heroine; it's all over. Nobody laughed.

"The Knight Errant" (Selig).—When, as happens in this picture, a character appears in the first scene and comes again on the screen after several scenes, it is not sure of being recognized by many. To make a character under these circumstances sure of being known, some peculiar dress or mark would be very valuable. In this picture it is the heroine's mother whom this reviewer failed to recognize and this failure made him think unjustly that the story was poorly constructed. The possible reasons for his not recognizing the woman are: She was fifteen years older then when she first appeared; the reviewer might have been a little inattentive at that point; the photography might have been dim; and the projection poor. Many of the scenes in the play are beautiful and well acted.

"The Younger Brother" (Edison).—Artfully made pictures of beautiful scenes are the most distinguishing feature of this film, which tells a story of an older brother's weakness leading a younger brother into vice and the older brother's shouldering the responsibility of his brother's crime. The scene in the father-in-law's house has a conservatory leading from it which was not very convincing in the picture. Some of the story's pictures are exquisite. There was, for instance, an almost fairy quality in the scene on the balcony overlooking Monte Carlo and the Mediterranean. As full of poetry in another way is the picture of a girl's sorrow as represented by the leading lady, Laura Sawyer. She is kneeling beside her bed destroying the elder brother's letters and the camera has brought out very finely the tones and values in her face, hair, draperies, the coverlet on the bed, the curtains of the room, etc. Again in a later scene at home, as she turns to the fireplace and also when she and the older brother (Herbert Prior) now cleared by the younger brother's (Richard Ridgley) confession, are left alone. The picturesque quality in this scene is very marked. It was a hard story to make clear in pantomime; but the acting was restrained and free, and makes the picture clear and effective.

"Elephant Hunting in Victoria Nyanza" (Pathe).—The photography of this picture is much poorer than usual in this company's wild animal pictures, of which "The Hippopotamus Hunt" is a good example. The picture is not exciting, hardly commendable as being educational. The big animals are shot down like tame bulls, but we see that one in his mortal agony has driven his tusks into the earth. The scene showing the animal being butchered is not particularly interesting.

"Max's Divorce" (Pathe).—One can't help laughing at Max he does get into embarrassing situations. A week or so ago this reviewer called attention to a picture released by an Independent company, as being in the Max vein. The situation, as far as its chief theme goes, in this picture is the same as in the picture we refer to. In the first case the trouble is caused by a June bug, in this case by a flea. The carying out of the idea is much better accomplished in this picture than in the former. One could hardly call this harmless and very funny farce refined. A flea may cause much fun, though he isn't acceptable in the best society.

"Treasure Trove" (Vitagraph).—Two old spinster ladies, much reduced in circumstances, but treasuring some beautiful antique furniture, are shown, when this picture opens, as at last compelled to part with some of it, but their hearts are almost broken. The treasure, that they find by means of a dramatically pictured dream, was buried by a Revolutionary ancestor years before and its discovery saves them from the necessity of parting with their furniture. The pictur's most noticeable defect is that the outside of the house seems but a one-storied shanty, while the inside scenes have the sumptuous proportions of an old Colonial homestead. The most notable quality in the picture is the art with which the grouping and photography were done. The final scene is a very pretty picture. It is a very commendable film.

"Wifey's New Hat" (Lubin).—The situation pictured in this film is both fresh and very amusing. The settings of the comedy are sumptuous rooms and scenes which are very clearly photographed indeed. It's a society picture and wifey's pretty gowns and the hats are pleasing, while the acting of the story, for the most part, is subdued and natural enough to let the spectators enjoy the situation thoroughly.

"Tale of a Soldier's Ring" (Selig).—We have seen one or two war-time pictures of late that have placed the standard of excellence for such very high. This picture is below the best Selig standard and below the best war pictures. Perhaps its theatrical acting is what most keeps it from being effective. There is a theatrical walk that seems timed to slow music. It isn't often seen in real life. Nearly all the players, especially the hero of this picture, indulged in it. He also indulged in much exaggerated posing. Although he and the other players showed, in many of the scenes, much intelligence, they gave a slightly unnatural atmosphere to the picture and, to the reviewer, it seemed to detract from the picture's illusion. The darkies of the picture seemed stiff, lacking in individuality, just two solemnities. They too seem to keep the picture somewhat from being alive. Yet the story is fairly exciting and commendable. The picture of Gen. R. E. Lee is the very best that this reviewer has seen in motion pictures.

"The New Operator" (Lubin).—The new operator came to the Lubin Company, asking for a job as a camera man and was given a motion picture camera and told to show what he could do. The pictures that resulted when he went out with the camera were very clear and distinct, but they were very queer. What is more, they tell the story of his wanderings and troubles better than a diary. When the reel was developed and projected, the Lubin people saw why he had sent the camera back by messenger with a note resigning or rather withdrawing from his job. The picture is very funny and will be very acceptable.

"The Quest for Gold" (Vitagraph).—An epic impression is the object of this picture of the rush of gold seekers to Alaska rather than a dramatic one. There is no personal story given. No characterization is attempted except such as shows the grim determination of Man, as a gold-seeker, to find the gold of the Yukon hills on the one hand, and the hardly less grim determination of the frozen North to freeze him out, starve him, tantalize and crush him, on the other. Many of the scenes were probably taken in Alaska in winter; they most certainly suggest it. In many of the scenes, however, the weather doesn't seem to be very cold. Men are seen taking off their caps after exercising; not often do we see white breath-clouds; and a stake is very easily driven into the ground through the snow. But the picture with the lines of the Yukon poet as leaders, is impressive, and taken as a whole seems truthfully illustrative.

"The Sheriff's Punishment" (Pathe).—Isn't this the first picture in which the sheriff plays the villain? They are not very common, anyway. This picture of bar-room, gambling dive, and man-hunt in a typically Western setting is very well acted and full of exciting incidents which are well knit into one dramatic and fairly convincing story. The best acting of the picture is done by the bar-keeping heroine, though the Mexican girl, the sheriff and the puncher who is counted the hero, act very creditably. The heroine's work gave a fresh touch to the scene in her bedroom after the sheriff has discovered, by her belongings on the floor that the hero is in the trunk and has promised to fire into it if he doesn't come out. It is a better Western picture than we usually see.

"An Accidental Outlaw" (Lubin).—All, or nearly all elements that give thrills to dramas of wild life in the West are found in this picture which has a tender-foot cowboy for its hero. He seems at first to be a softy and lets any passing bully rob or make sport of him. He walks along the road holding his revolver so like a simpleton that the approaching stage halts, thinking him an outlaw, and the passengers, as though trained, step out with hands held up and throw him their portable valuables. This alone makes the scene convincing, for it shows that they were panic-stricken—any stump that looked like a masked man would have been an outlaw to that stageful. The scene where the heroine, Dorothy, who cannnot ride is shown "out riding" —she walks by the horse's bridle—and is captured by the real outlaws; and the scene where our hero rescues her under the gang's very noses are far from convincing. The camera man, however, succeeded in making some very beautiful pictures of these scenes.

"The Clown's Baby" (Essanay).—In this story a little girl is left alone by her father's death, and is taken care of by a clown. Some wealthy people adopt her, but for a year she is dissatisfied. The circus passes that way again, the little one steals away and follows it and ultimately finds her way to the clown's dressing-room. When her foster father finds her she is locked in the clown's arms and refuses to leave him. The circus people come and give a rousing cheer for the return of Marjorie. There are some good pictures of circus people, and the child's acting is satisfactory.

"The Doomed Ship" (Edison).—Love and the miserly instincts of a ship-owner furnish the situation for this picture. A young man engaged to the ship-owner's daughter sails upon one of her father's vessels. The ship is unseaworthy and is wrecked. The blow kills the old man and almost kills the girl. But her lover is saved, and one day as she sits mourning at their trysting-place, she suddenly feels his strong arms about her and her grief is immediately changed to joy. The wedding bells ring happily, as they say in the stories.

"Conquering Carrie" (Kalem).—Carrie was the cook and something of a buster. She insisted on having a few friends in, and the mistress of the house gave up the parlor for the evening. Carrie's friends were very well selected types, just the men one would meet at a ward caucus. The women were, however, not types but peculiar individuals. Carrie "made up" into another character; but there are people in life also who seem to be changed by their Sunday clothes. The next day Carrie had trouble all day long. It was the big iceman who conquered her—the policeman couldn't.

"The Spender Family" (Essanay).—Heads of large families will appreciate this farcical character sketch. It is very amusing without being laughable.

"Commy, the Canvasser" (Essanay).—The space that this amusing story occupied when recently it was going the rounds as a newspaper skit was about three inches in one column. In this moving picture, it makes a good smile producer.

"Saved by the Pony Express" (Selig).—When the faces and individualities of the players in a moving picture are obscured by shadows, there is often much confusion in the spectator's mind. Because the faces in the first two or three scenes of this picture could not be clearly distinguished by this reviewer, he wasn't sure which of the two men who quarreled in the hut was the more acceptable to the girl on horseback whom it was plain both loved. The producer of the picture seems to have depended for interest largely on the bare dramatic struggle, the ride against time of the pony express rider to bring to the court the evidence that the hero is innocent. He has not shown us this hero in any significant action; we do not know what kind of a man he is. The jury believes that he shot the man who accidentally killed himself. This well-photographed jury of twelve good and true Westerners seems to have been very well chosen. They all look prosperous. Two are quick to take offense in an argument and are as quick to make up when they see their mistake. The pony express man rides remarkably well; he knows horses, wild and tame, and his ride with the dead man's last letter, ends in an exciting jump, horse and all, into the court room. One may ask whether juries in the West are apt to be formal. This jury had to retire again before it could change its verdict. It's an acceptable picture.

Independent.

"Bill Buys a Bottle of Champagne" (Lux).—This favorite comedian is shown in trouble again because a bottle of champagne persists in flying in the faces of passers-by. There is a lively chase, so lively that Bill is weary and must needs rest. Ultimately, however, he arrives at home, but judge his disappointment when he places the bottle to his lips to discover that the champagne is gone. He has had all his effort for nothing.

"Jim Crow—A Tale of the Turf" (Lux).—A dramatic picture, showing a jockey succumbing to the temptation of another owner to prevent the favorite from winning. The horse's foot is doctored. At the last moment the jockey is taken ill and the son rides. Then comes a picture of a famous race. All goes well until the last fence, when the favorite comes crashing to the earth with the jockey under him. He sustains fatal injuries and is taken to the hospital. It is a very dramatic scene in which the jockey realizes that he has killed his own son. He tells the story and the winner is arrested while in the midst of the celebration of his victory. The audience follows this film with unusual attention, both the race and the tragedy exerting a strong influence upon them. The mechanical work is well done and the race looks much like the actual thing.

"Artful Tweedledum" (Ambrosio).—This favorite comedian appears again in an altercation with the unknown father of his sweetheart which results in a challenge to a duel. When he discovers the predicament, he is at a loss for a while. But Tweedledum is not to be outwitted. He succeeds by an artful means in securing the good graces of the old gentleman once more.

"The Settler's Wife" (Nestor).—Stories of the perfidy of a wife or husband have been numerous. But in this film the Nestor company has produced one decidedly out of the ordinary. The smooth stranger readily enough entices the young wife from her husband. The husband overtakes them and would have killed the man, but for the interposition of the woman. However, he turns and leaves them after telling the man to be good to her. The man then realizes that the husband really loves her and sends her back to her home. She slowly drags her way back only to find a heap of blazing ruins. The husband has set the cabin on fire and left. The woman, as a result of her perfidy, finds herself alone in the wilderness, with nothing but its inhabitants to keep her company. The dramatic close makes this an extremely interesting picture. It transforms a rather commonplace subject into a strong story and makes it thrilling in its ending. The Nestorian photography assists materially in increasing the attractions.

"The Cattle Thief's Brand" (American).—In this somewhat complicated and not always easily understood Western story, dealing with the theft of cattle on the range, the wife of a rustler discovers her husband's nefarious business and releases a calf which he and his gang have picked up and branded with their own mark. She has forgotten that the calf will go back to its mother. The ranger appears, there is a fight in which the woman's husband is killed, but she succeeds in having the murderer released because she explains that he was protecting her honor.

"Her Way" (Rex).—A story may be unpleasant, but when it is told with such art as the producer and photographer of this picture have attained, the effect is far from depressing. In telling this story, the producer hasn't burdened us with scenes or details that add nothing, but has conducted it economically, using only what is highly significant, and so he has made it very effective. He also has chosen the settings of his scenes with art; they are natural, which is perhaps most important, and they are picturesque and beautiful. In this also the photographer's skill is very evident, for the scenes have been captured wonderfully. The players who enact this story of a woman who was willing to sacrifice her life for her husband when only an hour or so before she had discovered that he is unfaithful, and who thereby wins back his love, do very good and natural work. In this film the Rex Company has produced a very acceptable picture.

"The Fatal Sonata" (Itala).—Nearly all the foreign films are very well photographed. The camera work shown by this picture is it seems to this reviewer, far better, more careful, than that we usually see in pictures made in this country. We can turn out beautiful work of this kind, but our average work seems some distance below the standard set abroad. The story—domestic infidelity causes the situation that is pictured—has an unusual ending. The husband doesn't kill the interloper; he staggers out with a drunken grin of contempt, leaving the man and woman in the slatternly cabin. "What's the use?" it seems to ask with mor-dant sarcasm. The situation in which the old man found himself didn't appeal to his drunken brain as being worth a tragic ending. To have killed the man would have been, it must have seemed to him, an anti-climax. The acting is very good and the picture is conducted so as to make it intensely dramatic.

"Toto Without Water" (Itala).—This comedian in a funny play that gets across quite readily. Toto is something of a favorite and his antics in this picture will not reduce his popularity in any degree.

"The Prodigal Son" (Eclair).—This is a dramatic picture founded on the parable called by the same name. It follows the parable's outline closely in the early scenes, but at the coming back of the ragged son, it loses, in this reviewer's estimation, something of power by having the father fail at first to recognize the son. Nearly all the scenes have a restricted background; there are no broad fields of corn, nor herds of sheep; the father might have been a rich merchant. As the picture stands, it is very powerful. To see the man, once rich, feeding with the pigs, they are very dirty, and to remember that he was an aristocratic Hebrew, is very affecting. The pictures seem a little cold, as though the backgrounds were monotonous. One might be able to imagine a still better picture; but this, as it is, is very fine, very commendable.

"Mobile, Alabama" (Imp).—Pictures of cities, to be interesting, need only to be clearly photographed. When the reviewer saw the above title on the screen under the Imp name, he expected a delightful treat and was disappointed. The photography was poor and most of it was taken up by a parade, celebrating the Bi-centennial of the founding of the city, and of the fruit handling apparatus on the wharves. It also showed the clearing of woodland which was being done by blasting out the stumps.

"The Skating Bug" (Imp).—What brought the laughter out again and again while this roller skating picture was being projected was the dude of this picture. His actions were now and again so unexpectedly feminine and lady-like that they made a good many laugh right out. It's likely to be very aceptable to audiences.

"Thou Shalt Not Steal" (Reliance).—The object of this picture, which is not a sermon, is to show the heart of a young girl just budding out of childhood. She is religiously inclined and idealistic, and in her great love for truth or else great fear of evil, has an especial horror of stealing. When the scenario writer makes that girl see her own mother steal a bit of lace from a drygoods counter, he shows us a situation with great dramatic possibilities, and he has worked out these possibilities convincingly and made an unusual photoplay of them. The actress who plays the girl has maintained the child's simplicity with skill and is worthy of high praise. This reviewer doesn't think the first scene, whch, by the way, merely serves as a sort of title to the drama, was humanly normal or wholly convincing. The boy the girl catches "swiping" a bit of candy isn't her brother and she is too young to teach a Sunday-school class. To have had her pass an apple stand with, say, two other little girls and to have had one of them "swipe" an apple, expecting all the three to enjoy it together, would have pictured a very human experience. Whether the girl's spiritual condition was quite healthy or not doesn't concern this reviewer at this time; she surely is typical of many girls of her age.

"Mutt and Jeff" (Nestor).—These two inseparable friends wanted to be actors and got up a sketch representing the "Gold Dust Twins." It wasn't a hit. Poor little Jeff excites a good deal of sympathy. He is such a cute little chap and he seems always to get the roughest end of every encounter and he takes it very philosophically.

"A Happy Home" (Great Northern).—It was house-cleaning day when this picture was taken. A very human little boy and girl—terrible children—help mother and the hired girl till they are spanked and put into another room, where they get into all kinds of mischief. It surely is a lively picture.

"The Engagement Ring" (Great Northern).—The photography of the sea pictures on this film is too poor to show faces clearly. The scenes in the heroine's home are very artistic and clear. This is well, for the Danish costumes and characters are unusually interesting, and the room as well with its furnishings and decorations. In one scene in this picture a fisherman finds a ring in a fish's mouth—a miracle, of course. The story is not as clear as it might have been. There are two rings in the story, one given by the girl to her lover, and one his gift to her. This one is thrown into the sea, and another man, who loves the girl, finds it in a fish. The first lover now loses a ring at cards; but this reviewer had to read the film maker's synopsis before he knew that the girl had given the man that ring. In trying to get these rings back, the first lover loses his life. The scene in the police court during the examination into this man's death shows one or two very interesting typical Danish characters.

"The Parting Trails" (American).—Two brothers in this dramatic picture go west, one to the mountains and the other to the plains, where he engages in the cattle industry. The brother in the mountains becomes an outlaw. One day he hears that a stage coach is to pass with a large amount of money and plans to hold it up. The holdup is successful, but the outlaws do not get the money. In the fight the father of a girl who is the sweetheart of the other brother, is mortally wounded. This girl is present and they then decide to hold her for ransom. A posse is organized at the head of which is her lover, and the gang is hunted down. Just as the handcuffs are to be placed on the leader he falls dead, hit with a stray bullet. Then the man tells the girl that the leader was his brother.

"The Sea Vultures" (Yankee).—Wreckers and their nefarious work furnish the human background of this sea tale. A ship has been lured on the rocks by these men, a baby floats ashore and is adopted by the leader. Later she develops into a beautiful woman and gradually leads her foster father to reform. The two are ultimately instrumental in securing the capture, by government officials, of the gang. The young officer wins the girl for his wife. There are marine views well worth seeing and the story told in the picture is good enough to hold the unflagging interest of the audience.

"Perils of a War Messenger" (Champion).—If this film had begun with what is shown on the last few feet of the first scene, nothing significant would have been lost and it would have been freed from a very unconvincing battle scene. The picture shows the exploits of a Southern spy and is exciting; it is a picture, in fact, for the small boy and the gallery.

"True Hearted Miner" (Bison).—When a picture or work of art is characterized as having "a punch," it probably has behind it, in the artist, a vivid, emotion-giving realization. There is no cloudy sentimentality in this picture; these are living human beings, men and women, and whether we approve of them or not, we are compelled to be deeply interested. The drama has very few scenes and there is very little shown in it that is not significant. It pictures a woman's passion for her husband's partner and is made very convincing.

"Speculation" (Powers).—"Get-Rich-Quick Wallingford," not the play, but the book, furnished, with little doubt, the idea set forth in this picture; but a clever scenario writer evidently prepared it for being produced. It is not the kind of comedy that makes audiences laugh from beginning to end, but one that keeps them amused by picturing human situations, recognizable as possibilities. Sitting behind this reviewer were two middleaged men, business men apparently, but they chuckled heartily at the scene where the sharpers come back to town and find that the great scheme they really thought worthless had panned out that the duped men were rich.

"Outwitted by Horse and Lariat" (Solax).—The speedy movement of the early scenes of this briskly conducted and exciting picture promises a whiplash-snap at the finish which is amply fulfilled. The climax comes so unexpectedly and is so quickly accomplished that it literally brought some among the audience (14th Street Theater) to their feet. In that scene, the heroine is picked up at high speed from the midst of the outlaws who have captured her. The cowboy dashes in on a remarkably trained horse which an hour or so before untied with his teeth the little cowgirl and then took from her a note telling her friends where she was and bringing them to the rescue. As the cowboy picks her up the outlaws rush in pursuit and run into a pepper box of cowboy guns that give them another surprise.

"Double Elopement" (Solax).—Some of the scenes in this brisk farce brought out hearty laughter. Its funniest scene is perhaps where the respective father and mother of the eloping boy and girl find them in the stalled automobile. The worst fault with the picture is the make-up of the player who took the father's part. He wore a white wig, but was quite youthful in appearance.

"A CRACK SHOT."

Romaine Fielding, Leading Man of the Solax Stock Co.

"When Romaine Fielding, the leading man of the Solax Stock Company, was at Fort Myer recently, the officers of the crack 15th Cavalry noticed he laid claim to being somewhat of a soldier. They arranged a little joke by getting the moving picture actor at target practice. With some mock solemnity, things were arranged. The first was a bull's eye; the second, third and fourth were bulls' eyes. Fielding made nine out of ten and the officers opened a bottle. It then developed that Fielding, beside being identified for 25 years with the stage, spent three years at the Shattusk Military Academy, Faribault, Minn. He later drilled the first signal corps California ever had, saber and mounted drill, wig wag, light and heiliograph signal. He has written several articles on the "Use and Abuse of Arms." and is widely known as a crack shot.

DANIEL TALKS TO EXHIBITORS.

At the recent meeting of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of Illinois, held in Chicago, W. A. Daniels, of the Waterproof Film Company, addressed the meeting on the subject of waterproof film. In introducing his subject Mr. Daniels said: "Elbert Hubbard says there are three kinds of public speakers: instructive, humorous and punk. Before I sit down you will probably realize that I represent Mr. Hubbard's third class. Nevertheless, I am very glad of this opportunity to explain to your asssociation just what waterproof films are, and to give you my version of the reason why you ever get the other kind."

Continuing, Mr. Daniels explained the advantages of waterproof film, already familiar to readers of the Moving Picture World, and said in conclusion: "I want to congratulate you upon your organization. Continue to work in harmony regardless of your supply affiliations, and you must grow into the strongest power for good, which has ever entered the moving picture field. To your president, I would say, preside with due regard for the rights of all. To assist you in this labor and on the behalf of the National Waterproof Film Company I desire to present you with this gavel. May it ever be used with wisdom, and in the interest of truth and justice."

HEAD-ON COLLISION (Vitagraph).

The accompanying picture of a head-on collision between two locomotives is one of the feature incidents in the Vitagraph Monthly of Current Events, an educational and topical reel which will be released on August 18th. The collision occurred at Indianapolis, Ind., on July 4, and was pre-arranged as a scientific demonstration before a body of engineers. After starting their respective engines and throwing on full steam, the firemen and drivers jumped and the two locomotives came together with a crash that was heard for miles. The Vitagraph Monthly of Current Events, August issue, contains several other interesting features well calculated to create a demand for this novel kind of film.

"OLD WYOMING DAYS."

One of the most realistic and thoroughly original portrayals of true Western celebration is the three-reel subject, "Old Wyoming Days," taken at Lander, Wyo., the fringe of the Western border, during the Cowboy Convention July 4th. It is a production of splendid photographical merit and overflows throughout with thrills and excitement of true Western character.

The pictures will be exploited by the Western Feature Film Company of Chicago and will be shown throughout the country. The new company has created no little interest among the sporting circles of Chicago, as its founders are well-known exponents of the "Great American Pastime" and have won fame and fortune by their stunts on the dusty diamond. Jim Scott, for three years a satellite in the "White Sox" aggregation, and Bert Keeley, known to fame as a slab artist for the Washington "Senators," are the new recruits to the film game, while George Scott, the Cowboy Artist; A. L. Cooley, Ex-Assistant Chief of Scouts, U. S. A., and Sam Benjamin, well known showman, will lend their energies and influences to the success of the new venture.

"THROUGH JEALOUS EYES."

Jealousy, as manifested in human emotions, has been presented by the Lubin players in a picture soon to be released entitled "Through Jealous Eyes." It has a number of novel features of plot and has been worked out in a manner exceptionally convincing. The story has to do with a physician, his wife, their son and the office nurse. The son Arthur is about to go on a hunting trip with a friend. Before going he proposes to the nurse with some success. Through a series of incidents the doctor's wife conceives the idea that her husband has become unduly familiar with the nurse and at once becomes jealous. Subsequent events seem to confirm her suspicions and she is goaded almost to the point of doing murder. At this point in the story, the son, who has been accidentally shot while hunting, is brought home, and the jealous wife and mother is brought to understand the true meaning of the incidents that aroused her jealousy.

Scene from "Through Jealous Eyes" (Lubin).

Scene from "Through Jealous Eyes" (Lubin).

It is the belief of the Lubin producers that this subject will prove to be one of the most powerful picture plays made by them in some time. The accompanying illustrations are from scenes in the picture.

MORE MOTIOGRAPH FOBS COMING.

The Enterprise Optical Company asks the Moving Picture World to advise late applicants for the Motiograph Watch Fob that it will be necessary for them to wait a while for their fobs. The first edition of fobs, something near to 6,000, have been distributed, and the Enterprise folks have letters of thanks enough to make a large and very interesting volume. Since the supply was exhausted fifty or more applications have been received. These will be held up for a while to enable the Motiograph people to determine just how many more it will be necessary to order. It's worth waiting for.

A GLIMPSE BEHIND THE SCENES.

Visiting the Vitagraph factory after a period of one year, the writer found great changes and greater developments over those chronicled a year ago.

Besides an enlargement of the factory plant, a larger force of employees in the technical and mechanical branches is evidence of a continuously increasing industrial activity. A large company of artists were busy before the camera in the extensive studio. Never before has the writer had the rare opportunity of visiting a many-staged theater; a tri-ringed circus is possible in the field, but a tri-staged theater seems only possible under such enterprising conditions as those which control such important moving picture concerns of which the Vitagraph is a type.

Standing, watching a comedy to the left and a drama to the right; in the further studio a stage production, and in the open an automobile scene; it became simply a matter of taking one's choice in which to become most interested. The thoroughness of this acting before a dead camera rather than with the inspiration derived from a living audience is very complete. A few years ago an air of indifference seemed to control all artists, for were they not "only before the camera," life and realism were plainly absent, actions were perfunctory and speech such that it mattered not if actions and words did not agree. To-day this is all changed, and it is impossible to find more thorough realism that that shown in these studios.

Actors and actresses have found that the lens is but the focused eye of countless throngs, and act their parts with a perfection that is thrilling, and which explains why the pictures have become more popular in that they are more real. The only absence noticeable in these plays is that of the deserved applause, but here the artist is recompensed by that representative of the public—the director, whose "well done" or "very good" is the sought-for appreciation, and upon whose verdict the play passes into picture.

A part of each day is given to a genuine "picture show," where "first views" are given and those who have taken part may "see themselves as others see them"; here all mistakes, artistic, moral, technical, are noted and (figuratively speaking) the editorial blue pencil is vigorously used. Improvement and advancement seems to pervade the very atmosphere of Vitagraph; everyone seems to have caught the spirit of the age; instruction and injunctions posted for the information of all are of the highest order, and manifest a determination to produce such results as can only come from proper surroundings.

A view "behind the scenes" usually means to catch a glimpse of "secrets" and "weaknesses" which it were better the public should neither see nor hear about; the writer's view behind the scenes of Vitagraph revealed no such "hidden things," and this is as clear behind the screen as in front of it. Thanks to the kindly courtesy of Mr. Blackstone and Mr. A. E. Smith, the writer's visit to Vitagraph only compels his congratulations and best wishes.

"ROMEO AND JULIET" IN TWO REELS.

The Thanhouser feature production of "Romeo and Juliet" in two reels has been whipped into shape for exhibition. It will be released on consecutive Fridays, Part I, Friday, September 1st, and Part II, Friday, September 8th. Prior to this, private exhibitions will be given for exchange men and other interested parties, and the film of "the greatest love story of all" will be given chance a plenty to make good with the people who distribute the Independent product.

The reels are so constructed that each tells a complete story. Giving a half hour's show as they do when [illegible] together, they will enable exhibitors to give a "Romeo and Juliet Night" that affords all manners of [illegible] opportunity for feature advertising. Many managers will use them as they appear for the first showing, and book them together for the return date.

CAPTAIN WARREN DEAN.

15th U. S. Cavalry, Fort Myer, Va.

Captain Dean was a welcome visitor at the Solax Company's studio this week, where he dropped in to see some of the big pictures made by his crack regiment recently by the Solax Company, and in which he once or twice appeared. He expressed himself as being highly pleased with the results, and the entire productions give credit to the realities as they are at Fort Myer

A PAL'S OATH.

A Heart Interest Drama by the Essanay Western Players.

Not long ago the pastor of a church in California wrote to G. M. Anderson, director of the Essanay Western Stock Company, complimenting him for the uplifting and ennobling influences of his productions saying that he considered the moving picture a great power for good. This is the view of one clergyman of a broader mind that a number of his brethren. It shows the ever increasing tendency to give the picture fair play and broader-minded criticism.

"A Pal's Oath," a coming release by the Essanay Company, is a sermon picture with as strong a moral and as human a story as has recently been released by any company. Two pals, Jack Manley and John French, are "bunkies" on the XX ranch. Having punched cattle side by side for five years, partners always in every game of poker at "Red" Ike's in town, they are stanch in their friendship.

Scene from "A Pal's Oath" (Essanay).

At the opening of the story French has fallen ill with a fever. Both of the boys are "broke" and after Jack finds that his pal must have a doctor he saddles a horse and rides to town for Dr. Small. Small is an avaricious fellow and when Jack asks for his aid he replies that the cost of his services will amount to $30 and that he must have the money in advance. In despair Jack returns to his shanty where he tells French of his luckless visit to Dr. Small. Musing in a puzzled manner of how he can obtain the money he suddenly arises and turning to the door opens it to the pony express rider who has just arrived with a few pieces of mail. Jack chats with the fellow for a moment and notes curiously a small bag, evidently containing money which the rider shifts from one pouch to another. Suddenly seizing his gun and the cartridge belt, he fastens on these, slips a handkerchief around his neck and with a hasty goodbye to John, runs hurriedly out of the cabin, quickly mounts his horse and is cantering off in hot pursuit of the flying rider. What follows can easily be understood.

The Doctor comes now with Jack to the sick man's bedside, who is relieved by the treatment. After the recovery Jack confesses the hold-up of the pony express rider, but French is loyal and understands. Stretching out his hands he takes the other's and murmurs: "Your secret is mine. You did it for me."

Now both meet a girl and fall in love with her. Jack wins the girl and French is enraged. Suddenly he remembers the crime of his pal and betrays him, the latter is arrested and put into prison.

A few years later French and his wife and little girl are seated in the parlor of their little home, the child playing at their feet. On the outside of the cottage, a slinking form comes out of the bushes and approaches the window of the cottage. Suddenly there is the flash and the barrel of a revolver is pressed against the curtain of the open window. French, inside, suddenly stoops and picks up the child, tosses her in his arms and turns with her facing the window. The man, outside, drops the gun to his side and looks at the spectacle with an expression of pain. But he conquers the better motive and turning again raises the gun. The operation is repeated twice, the last time Marie rising and throwing her arms about the baby's neck while French clasps them both in his arms, safe from Norton's bullet behind the little child and his wife. Outside, Norton turns away, a look of despair on his face, then thrusts the gun into its holster and pausing to again look at the scene inside turns again and slips off into the bushes, while the gathering dusk hides him from view.

A THRILLING LEAP (Rex).

The Rex Motion Picture Company has just completed an Indian subject that sets a pace for most of the redskin dramas in the matter of physical endurance. The picture will be known as "A White Red Man," and turns upon the pivot of circumstantial evidence. An Indian found some articles of jewelry that had been dropped by a wounded robber. A little later the Indian became entangled in a bear trap and made his way in great pain to the cabin of the trapper. The trapper's wife dressed the wounds of the red man, who, in order to show his gratitude, gave her some of the jewelry and passed on his way.

Meanwhile, the sheriff, on track of the stolen gems, arrived at the trapper's cabin where he saw the jewels, which were still lying on the table. The trapper was taken to jail as the guilty man. That night in another town the Indian in a bar-room heard the story of the arrest of the kind-hearted trapper and at once set out with all speed to testify in his behalf. Traveling overland on foot and in haste, there were many obstacles to encounter, but principally a chasm which yawned before the dusky brave to a depth of eighty feet. Rivers and chasms were not to be considered where the life of a good man was at stake. Arriving at the precipice the Indian saw at a glance that it was a case of jump, or his benefactor would be lynched. Without hesitation he plunged into the roaring canyon and was soon buffeting in the whirlpool. Struggling on, the redskin arrived in time to save his friend's life. This particular feat of high jumping is one that has seldom been equaled anywhere, whether in moving pictures or otherwise, and will be a feature that can be strongly advertised.

UNLAWFUL IMPORTATION.

U. S. Government Prompt in Protecting Copyright Films.

The United States Government will effectually protect the copyright, obtained for a film, whether such film is of domestic or foreign make. Persons, who have heretofore been "careless" in respecting copyrights of this nature should take warning from the following facts:

Mr. Ingvald Oels, of the Great Northern Film Company, some time ago secured an American copyright on the three reel production, "Temptations of a Great City," and subsequently notified the Treasury Department, U. S. Custom Service, to the effect, that he anticipated an importation of this film by other parties. The importation of a copyrighted film from abroad is not only an invasion of the rights of the party securing the original copyright, but also constitutes an unlawful act and a violation of the U. S. Custom Regulations. The Treasury Department took careful notice of Mr. Oels' request and at once notified all the ports of entry, which were supplied by Mr. Oels with photographs depicting various scenes from the reels.

On the 29th of July Mr. Oels was notified, that the examiner on duty in the Philadelphia Post Office had discovered in the parcels post a three-reel film, which upon examination proved to be the production previously copyrighted by Mr. Oels. The matter was reported by the examiner to the Special Agent in charge of the Philadelphia Custom Service, Mr. W. S. Chance. Mr. Chance at once communicated with Mr. Oels, notifying the latter of the fact that the unlawfully imported film had been found and was now held for forfeiture proceedings. Mr. Oels will at once take the necessary steps to enforce the forfeiture provisions of the new copyright law and the film will be destroyed.

It is said, that as an extra precaution against unlawful importations of this film there has been deposited by the American lessee of it, a complete copy with Chief Wilkie of the Secret Service Bureau. This was done to make it easy for that department to trace the film, if it should ever get past the watchful eyes of Uncle Sam. Judging by the prompt and careful action of the government officials in this case this extra precaution was hardly needed, but can do no harm.

THE EXHIBITOR'S LIBRARY.

In the advertising pages will be found the announcement of three books, printed, published and sold by the Moving Picture World at nominal cost to exhibitors who wish to present literary, classical or historical feature films of special note in a proper and profitable manner. In this exhibitor's library is a second edition of the book, "How to Put on the Passion Play," which has a well-established reputation among exhibitors for usefulness and accuracy. A similar book has been printed for the feature films, "Dante's Inferno" and "The Crusaders or Jerusalem Delivered." The books will will be found useful, if not indispensable, by every exhibitor who wishes to rent any of the features mentioned. Additions to this library for the exhibitor may be made from time to time as occasion will seem to demand. The lectures, which form part of every one of these books, have all been specially prepared by W. Stephen Bush.

HERRICK EXPLOITS KINEMACOLOR.

Howard Herrick, who, in co-operation with Col. Jas. S. Hutton, so successfully handled the publicity and booking of the moving pictures of the Confederate Reunion and parade at Little Rock, which were taken by the Industrial Moving Picture Company of Chicago, under the direction of Watterson R. Rothacker, has been specially engaged by the Messrs. Shubert to handle the publicity for the Chicago presentation of the kinemacolor pictures of the coronation at the Garrick Theater.

Mr. Herrick left the newspaper field about ten years ago to engage in theatrical work. Since then he has been manager and press representative for such stars and attractions as Bertha Kalich, Virginia Harned, Ernst von Possart, "The Shepherd King" and the "Clansman."

MOVING PICTURE THEATERS PREPARING FOR FALL AND WINTER.

As indicated by the numerous inquiries received for new equipments, and exchange of new moving picture machines for old, Mr. J. H. Hallberg, "The Economizer Man," reports that the outlook for the coming season is very bright. Managers all over the country recognize the fact that their patrons demand the best that money can procure in the way of picture projection, and the old make-shift devices are being relegated to the junk heap. "I want a good light and a clear, steady picture." That is the prevailing note in all the inquiries.

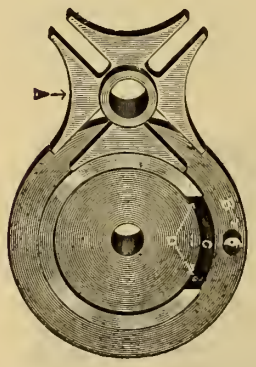
THE LAVEZZI OUTPUT GRADUALLY INCREASES.



The testimonials which appear in his advertisement in this issue regarding Lavezzi's improved star, cam, arbor and sprocket, show the real value of his improvements.

Mr. Lavezzi states that operators have always had considerable trouble removing screws from intermittent sprockets. The reason for this is that the screws are put in with a special screw-driver that will not split and injure the slot. It stands to reason that the screws will have to be removed with the same sort of blade. Mr. Lavezzi has met the need by placing on the market a special screw-driver, which will have nicely tempered interchangeable blades, to remove small screws from tension springs, etc. He will furnish circulars, etc., if you will drop him a line.

A LAW UNTO THEMSELVES.

Correspondents signing themselves "Two Aggrieved Exhibitors," ask The World to inform them by what authority managers of exchanges take regular releases, such as "Faust," "Ten Nights In a Barroom," "Tale of Two Cities," etc., out of the regular service after they have been run for some time, and place them under the head of specials, charging $10 per day for them.

The World confesses ignorance of any rule or usage that might prevent the exchange manager from going as far as he likes along the lines mentioned; it's up to him to get all he can for service. Of course, the exhibitor has the privilege of getting service somewhere else if he doesn't like the treatment accorded him now. That's the only antidote we know of.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

COWBOYS ALWAYS POPULAR.

July 29, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World,

Dear Sir.—Notwithstanding Mr. Emmett Campbell Hall's masterly retort to my rejoinder concerning his reply to my articles on adequate payment for comedy scenarios, I positively refuse to follow the illustrious precedent initiated by Davy Crockett's coon, and to "come down."

Mr. Hall may remember that the title and substance of the article in question was: "Does It Pay To Be Funny?" Mr. Hall admits that he has had little experience in the writing of comedy. Mine has been considerable, and the experience was not so invariably "funny" as were my scenarios—which is, perhaps, not saying a good deal. At any rate, the "motif" of my original rhapsody was that the manufacturers howl eternally for comedy, and particularly for comedy—and yet decline to hand over a compensation for the work liberal enough to pay a writer to dig deep into his imagination and shovel out the real article.

And the Average Patron and the Average Exhibitor are not "sick of cowboys with bewhiskered pants." Where does Mr. Hall get his information? Not at first hand; for to quote Mr. Hall direct—"I belong in the backwoods—and only once in awhile—a very long while—grease my boots and wander down ter the city." Then his opinion is not worth much as evidence. How many photoplay audiences does Mr. Hall see in a week? The writer lives in a large city, with New York nine miles away; and he has seen an average of twenty reels of licensed film a week for the past three years. Furthermore, he has made a close study of Mr. Average Patron; which is why he affirms for the third and last time that cowboys and real comedy are popular everywhere and always, and that the average "dramatic," in a comparative sense, is not.

As for the rest, we are "tilting at windmills." Mr. Hall is a likeable and courteous opponent; but a "highbrow," with a leaning toward the tragic muse. The writer is a manufacturer of comedy—and a plain man with a grouch. But we agree in essentials. If our opinions differ as to what constitutes the "popular" in motion pictures, we are both working for the good and lasting future of the industry, and we both think we are delivering the goods. Probably we are. There is room in the photoplay world for the "dramatic" and the sunny side of life, but it is unfair that the optimist should have a harder time reaping his reward.

For if Mr. Hall should stray from his "twelve-cent raspberry" elysium and wander with imagination into the moonlit fields of comedy, he would find moonbeams a light repast for a healthy appetite and he would hit the trail for his mountain-top" with all the speed consistent with his "highbrow" dignity.

Reciprocating Mr. Hall's kind sentiments and his enjoyment of our controversy, and trusting that the argument has been as amusing to the World editor and the World readers, I remain, Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM H. KITCHELL.

A "KICKLESS" SCENARIO WRITER!

Kokomo, Ind., July 27, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World,

Dear Sir.—While mailing you my annual subscription for the World, I wish to avail myself of the opportunity to say a few words regarding the treatment I have received from scenario editors in general, and one in particular.

I have noticed contributions from scenario writers from time to time, most of them being kicks. This one—is it different? It is not my purpose to say just how successful a writer I am, though I will say I am not in the same class with Mr. Hall, who has sold ninety per cent. of his stories. However, I have "peddled" enough to know that I have been very well treated by the editors. While it is true I have never received a fancy price for a script, it is also true that I have not received as low as $15 except in one instance, and that for a half-reel subject. Promptness seems to be the motto of every editor with whom I have had dealings, as in only two instances have I had a script kept a month. The first was by reason of the company moving into new quarters. The other was a lost script, of which I will speak presently. I sold one story which could not possibly have been in the editor's office more than one day. I have never had a script mutilated by notations but once, and that would not have occurred had I placed a sheet of blank paper on either side of it, as I now do. Thanks to Mr. Sargent for that tip.

Now, about the lost script: After reading a number of complaints about them in The World, I supposed, of course, that if a firm ever lost one of mine I could say good-bye to it. But that did not worry me much, as I always keep the original, which every writer should do. Well, it finally happened. Did that end it? Not much—and right here is what I call a square deal. The editor wrote me that the script could not be found, and although it was lost through no fault of his (I know that to be a fact), if I wished payment for it he would send me check at once. Of course I did not take advantage of his liberal offer. I merely had a copy typed, sent it in and shortly afterward received a check. What company? Imp. And I have only the highest praise for the courteous treatment extended me by Editor Hoadley.

"KICKLESS."

GOOD OPERATOR DISCOVERED.

Butler, Pa., June 30, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World,

Dear Sir: If you will kindly allow me a little space in your valuable publication, I would like to tell your readers of a young operator whom I found here in Butler in the person of Mr. John North. I landed in this town Wednesday, June 28th. After a good supper at the Hotel Nixon, being an old operator myself, I started out to see a moving picture show; and as the Lyric is the best here, I was directed there. Imagine my surprise, upon entering, to see some of the finest work that it has ever been my pleasure to witness. I was told the operator's name was John North; that he was a native of Punxsutawney, Pa.; that he was young in years but old in experience. Why, Mr. Editor, to sit there and watch his pictures you would almost swear that they were standing still instead of moving. He is by odds the best operator I have seen for a number of years. He certainly has his Powers No. 6 down pat; and, in conclusion, I want to say that the proprietor who is lucky enough to secure such an operator as John North, of Butler, Pa., should certainly appreciate him. Yours truly,

AN OLD OPERATOR.

AN APPRECIATIVE EXHIBITOR.

Sacramento, Cal., June 9, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir.—I have been a subscriber of the Moving Picture World for several years and what I know about the projection of pictures I owe to the Moving Picture World. This paper is the best of its class in the world and exhibitors and operators cannot afford to do without it, as it is a great benefit to cinematography interests. Speaking of operators. I certainly have one of the best in Sacramento. This man has been working for me for several years and his main object seems to be to give the best pictures possible.

Yours very truly,

J. W. OSTARIO,
Mgr. and Prop. Lyric Theater.

PLAYING THE PICTURES.

Superior, Neb., July 14, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World,

Dear Sir.—As the original demonstrator of "Playing the Pictures" I would respectfully make a suggestion to all film manufacturers who are desirous of extending their business, and that is: to engage a thoroughly competent pianist of experience who can play the pictures as they ought to be played and act as demonstrator of films in every State in the Union, thereby showing the public the realistic effect produced by having the pictures properly played and cued, and not having their films murdered by incompetent and inexperienced pianists. Such a demonstrator would prove an invaluable acquisition to any film manufacturer and by the time he would cover the various houses in the State he demonstartes the films in, the manufacturers would increase their business tenfold. To such a man the film manufacturer could afford to pay a good salary and thus properly advertise his films in every State. My instrumental demonstrations of "playing the pictures" have long been regarded as a striking feature in the popularizing of the leading films produced by the Biograph, Vitagraph, Selig Polyscope, and Edison companies. Trusting this suggestion will be acted on by any film manufacturer who desires to popularize his films, believe me, Yours fraternally,

FRANK J. FLOOD.

MORE TALKING PICTURES.

Baltimore, Md., July 21, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World,

Dear Sir.—I am a subscriber to your Moving Picture World and find it to contain very interesting reading matter. I am a mechanical expert and inventor of several years' experience, and would like to call the attention of film manufacturers through your paper to what is within their reach to improve the motion pictures. I have invented and have patents pending for taking and reproducing talking, singing and dancing pictures with the sound of the actors, or, in other words, producing the play as on the stage with orchestra accompanying, etc. The discarding of a part of the film does not destroy the effect, and is not dependent upon the operator to remedy, but is done automatically.

I would be pleased to hear from any film manufacturer that is interested in this subject. This same device can be used for the bettering of projection of pictures, as through your paper I have read several comments that "a part of the picture should be run faster, and a part slower than the usual speed to produce better effects."

For this you depend upon the operator, who in many cases pays no attention to that important matter; but let the manufacturer of the film fix the film with the device in the operating room, which will control the speed.

I would also say, let the managers, operators or any one else suggest ideas of what would improve the picture shows through your paper and if they have not ability to invent a way for it, you will find that the inventors will "find the way." I would thank you very much if you give this correspondence space in your next issue. I am,

Very truly,

JAMES D. WILSON,

1714 W. Lafayette Ave., Baltimore, Md.

AN ARGUMENT FOR THE OPEN MARKET.

Jacksonville, Fla., July 13, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir.—The licensed makers are to be congratulated on the class of pictures released in the last sixty days. Some of these subjects I consider at least equal, if not superior, to any that have been made within the last year. I refer most especially to the following: "Faust," by Pathe; "Star Spangled Banner," by Edison; "Indianapolis Auto Races," by Essanay; "Enoch Arden," by the Biograph Company; "Fighting Blood," by the same company; "Coronation," by Pathe; "Battle Hymn of the Republic," by the Vitagraph; "The Railroad Raiders of '62," by the Kalem Company; "Saving the Standard," by Gaumont; "The King's Daughter," by the same company, and "The Crusaders," by Edison. In fact, with the exception of one or two companies, I consider that the associated manufacturers have greatly improved their product both in subject matter as well as photography. It is my opinion that the Gaumont product as a whole pleases more intelligent moving picture patrons than any other pictures released by the Patents Company. I am firmly of the opinion that the time is not far distant when the public demand will necessitate the making of more two and three reel subjects. I have always contended that if a sufficient amount of pictures of real interest and accordingly of greater length, were made, the exhibitor could charge a higher admission price, and could show each subject more than one day, and could easily afford to pay as much rental for six subjects that comprise two reels each as he is now paying for twelve reels comprising one subject each. I am further of the opinion that by reducing the amount of subjects the scenario writer and the producer could give more serious thought to the perfection of details, and the product in turn would warrant from the public such commendation as would make the second day's showing in most instances more profitable than the first. A great many years of my life have been devoted to the moving picture business, during which time I have studied conditions very closely. This applies not only to the exhibitor but to the manufacturer as well. I have observed with chagrin some of the sudden developments, and the continued determination on the part of the manufacturers to give more thought to quantity instead of quality has been a serious worry to me. It seems a pity to me that pictures of national and international interest should be shown for a paltry sum of 5c. or 10c. The price alone would deter a fair percentage of good thinking people from becoming patrons, and in turn the supporters of the world's most educational form of amusement; however, the exhibitors' hands are tied by what I consider the manufacturers' own mistake to insure a permanent success for the moving picture establishment; the exhibitor must charge a uniform price of admission, and unless he has from the manufacturers assurances that their product will always warrant the raised price of admission, his desire to elevate the price as well as the tone of his amusement place will be futile. As matters stand today, the exhibitor who has given his entire life and every thought to the moral elevation of the business must stand on a level with the illiterate and indifferent exhibitor who gives no thought to the future of the business further than the protection of his investment. If more high-class pictures were released, the exhibitor of deeper thought and heavier investment would some day be recognized, at least by those of his class. It has often occurred to me that there should be a distinction in pictures, for it seems a shame to place a Western picture that depicts a saloon brawl as its moral on the level with the Biblical production of "The Kiss of Judas."

It appears to me that the manufacturers' methods of selling their product much resembles the ancient method of disposing of slaves, in which respect quantity and quality bear an equal footing.

Editor Moving Picture World,

Dear Sir.—In writing this article I do not wish to give the impression that I have visited every picture house in the country, nor do I want any one to think that I am an authority on running them. I only wish to give my views as one of the public. I am deeply interested in motion pictures and have followed them from the "Great Train Robbery" film down to date; in fact, I'm a picture "fiend" of the most critical kind and take in a picture show daily. But what has prompted me to write this is the houses that make a specialty of playing two or three vaudeville acts in connection with their show. Why will a manager spoil his show with this stuff? Let it be understood that I am not knocking vaudeville or its artists. Good vaudeville is a very high class of entertainment, but poor vaudeville is something fierce and pretty hard to endure sometimes. Unfortunately it is always the cheap kind that breaks through via the picture shows. If the public want a cheap vaudeville show they can go to a vaudeville house and see it, but when they want to see motion pictures they want to see them and not a lot of "Ham" actors stalling around the stage for fifteen minutes. Motion pictures are by far a much higher class of entertainment than poor variety acts, and as soon as the managers of the picture houses get wise to this fact, they will find business better than it is. I have seen many a ten, twenty and thirty cent vaudeville show and the pictures were the best thing on the bill.

Illustrated songs don't go so far to make the show better—that is, when the singer happens to be one of the sing-song variety. I have sat in many a picture show and heard people express their disgust of the singer. It kills the show and makes people go away with an idea that the whole show was poor.

Nothing helps the pictures as much as properly played cue music. The music adds the proper element of expression to the subject, for if the picture is a sad one, sad music will play it up strong. On the other hand, if the picture is a comedy, lively tunes enliven it. Some of the theaters here in the city where I live have made the mistake of having one of those automatic kill-joys in front of their place. No matter what picture you are seeing, the hurdy-gurdy contiues to grind out its uncertain melody, sometimes the overture from "Faust" and again the "Grizzly Bear." This sort of thing should be stopped for the good of the business.

There is another thing that I want to mention and that is our friend the drummer. The other day I sat enjoying a very dramatic film entitled, I believe, "Sins of Society." The atmosphere of this picture is highly emotional. Toward the finis of the picture, where the husband embraces his wife, I was aroused from my enjoyment by the honking of an automobile horn in the hands of the drummer—and this is one of the best picture houses in the city! This kind of work is pretty crude and gives the "rough-necks" in the house a chance to indulge in a lot of "horse" laughs and "cat" calls. The film of course lost all of its dramatic worth and the effect was spoiled by foolishness of a drummer. Managers should watch this and stop it, for it surely does not help the business any.

As for the producers of pictures, let us have less of the Indian drama, less of the Cowpuncher comedies—where the cowpunchers never seem to be working—and more historical dramas which are both entertaining and instructive. The travelogues are very interesting to one who has never traveled to any extent, yet one a week is plenty.

But listen to this plea, picture house managers, cut that cheap vaudeville stuff. Cut it out even if it shortens your show by half an hour. Remember that the quality of the pictures is always on the increase, but cheap vaudeville remains the same. And don't forget to tell your drummer about that horse play work while the drama is on the screen; only the "rough-necks" fall for that sort of stuff and they are not the people that go every day. Yours for straight pictures. "FILMITIS,"

One of the regulars.

The Vaudi-Photo Amusement Company, which recently opened in the old Clunie Theater, Sacramento, Cal., gave up the ghost after a few weeks' stay and has also folded its tents and departed from Marysville, and Chico, Cal. The Marysville Democrat says that a couple of kid managers were at the helm and that they tried to make good without the use of advertising, with the usual result.

CORRESPONDENCE

LOUISVILLE.

As usual, the picture men are glad to say, Louisville moving picture theaters have passed through a prosperous week. Indubitable evidence of present prosperity lies in the plans for extension in local show interests, for within the next six months, the aggregate investment in the business in the Bluegrass metropolis will have been increased at least 50 per cent. Considering the present magnitude of photoplay interests in this city, the statement is important.

Fred J. Dolle, Henry Reiss and Architect S. P. Ostrander, all connected with the Broadway Amusement Company, returned from a trip to St. Louis, Mo., and Chicago, Ill., last week, bringing a wealth of new ideas to be incorporated into the two handsome houses which the Broadway concern will erect in the suburban districts of Louisville. It has been announced that the Broadway company will replace its present airdomes, the Ideal, at Twenty-sixth and Market Streets, and the Baxter, on the Bardstown Road, with large and strictly up-to-date theaters, work of construction on these establishments to be commenced as soon as possible.

"The new houses will each have a capacity of about 1,500 persons," said Joseph Steurle, of the Broadway company, to a representative of The Moving Picture World. They will be modeled along the most approved lines as regards both beauty and safety, Architect Ostrander having accompanied Messrs. Dolle and Reiss for the purpose of gaining professional knowledge of the latest and best showhouses in St. Louis and Chicago. It is expected that each of the houses will cost $30,000. Further details concerning the new structures will be forthcoming later.

"The Princess Amusement Company has been very successful with its chain of shows during the past week, but there have been no especial developments," said General Manager Irvin Simon.

L. J. Dittmar, of the Majestic Amusement Company, reports a gratifying amount of business at both the Majestic and the Royal, in fact, the Majestic is being enlarged to take care of growing business. Mr. Dittmar has had plans drawn for a $30,000 addition to the theater across from the Custom House, and expects to have his enlargements completed by November 1st, affording a total seating capacity of 1,500 persons. The Majestic addition will be as complete in modern detail of safety and convenience as is the present structure.

L. J. Dittmar, who organized the Kinemacolor Company in Kentucky a few weeks ago, for the exhibition of specially made Kinemacolor films of King George's coronation, holding state rights in Ohio, Indiana and Kentucky, said that these special offerings would probably not be in shape for presentation in local territory before a month or so.

"Our business has been normal, but very satisfactory," was the report of the Crystal Amusement Company, conducting the Crystal House.

M. Switow, of the 3-Falls Cities Amusement Company, operating shows in Jeffersonville and New Albany, Ind., and the Crystal, in Louisville, and now constructing The Novelty, on Fourth Avenue, went to Chicago, Ill., the early part of this week to gather new ideas for the $30,000 showhouse, which is to live up to its name by installing the latest and best in the picture show world.

J. Greenberg, a well-known local pawnbroker and hotel keeper, is seeking to dispose of his picture show property, The Victoria, on Market Street, near Third Avenue. Mr. Greenburg says that his other interests require his entire attention.

Manager Charles Shaw, at The Avenue Theater, is having continued success with his mid-summer run of picture offerings. Interesting and instructive scenes of out-door Western life are proving to be big favorites with the Louisville public, he reports.

It is not often that executive authority in a metropolis has to take a hand in the moving picture business, but such was the case last week in Louisville, when Sol. Ullmann, 1479 South Second Street, organized a stock company for the purpose of erecting a picture theater on Second Street, near Burnett Avenue, in one of the highest class residential sections of the city. The house was to cost $10,000, and was to be up-to-date in every respect. It happens that Mayor W. O. Head lives directly across the street from the proposed theater site, and his Honor objected on the grounds that the house would be a nuisance to residents of the neighborhood. Executive displeasure proved sufficient to cause Mr. Ullmann and his associates to give up the project and search for another suburban location less liable to a knockout from the administration.

A deal was closed last week in Madisonville, Ky., whereby E. K. Walker and A. D. Noe become the owners of the equipment of the Lyric picture theater in that place. The new owners have closed down the Lyric and are operating at the Princess Theater in Madisonville.

SAN FRANCISCO.

Through the streets of San Francisco, a few months ago, a white-canvased, red-lettered wagon wound its way slowly. A brass band heralded its approach, and it didn't need close observing to read the following announcement: "We'll go them one better. Come to the Princess Theater tonight. We get the latest films first. Pictures and vaudeville changed every day. Every seat 5 cents." "Another good theater gone wrong," my companion observed to me as the moving ad passed us. "Another good theater gone right." I corrected.

The theatrical situation here seems to have simmered down to a frantic effort among the managers to secure first-runs of the photoplays. The consequence is, that the film service is costing them so much that their expenses exceed their profits. As a part solution, some of the managers of the houses have joined hands, so to speak, and are doing what is called "tagging the reels." After the reel has been run in one theater, a messenger jumps on his wheel and hurries the film to the other theater. In that way the cost of the reels are cut almost in half. There is an effort being made to put a stop to "tagging reels."

The Globe and the Lyceum Theaters here are doing something I haven't heard of any other house in the country doing, and that is running four first-run pictures daily. The owners of these two houses are Turned & Dahnken, also owners of the local film exchange. While other theaters advertise that their pictures each day are all first-run reels, in reality Turner & Dahnken are the only ones so far doing it.

The Princess, in becoming a picture house, is merely following in the footsteps of other big theaters here that were originally intended, and until lately used, for high-priced productions. Built especially for stock companies, later leased by Pantages at 10, 20 and 30 cents, the Princess, under both regimes failed. The night it was opened as a picture and vaudeville house, it was filled to overflowing and has been that way ever since.

The managers of three remaining houses here that play dramatic productions, are complaining bitterly that the picture houses are hurting them and one realizes that they are not exaggerating when one sees lined up in front of the picture houses automobiles and one observes the prosperous, intelligent-looking people that make up the audiences in the first class moving picture theaters.

Next door to the Princess is the Garrick, another "legit" house turned into a picture house, and I can truthfully say it is the most popular one in San Francisco, for three reasons, namely: the pictures are always interesting; the orchestra is excellent, and, last but not least, no cheap vaudeville is put on. Instead there is usually one or two singers whose voices are worth listening to.

San Francisco is overrun and satiated with poor vaudeville players and it is one lamentable feature of the picture houses. Eventually the managers will get wise and instead of expending money in salaries for inexperienced and untalented vaudevillians, will expend in providing fine orchestras which will play appropriate music for the picture and selections between reels to rest the eyes of the audience.

The attitude of the people toward the photoplay performers reminds me of the spirit patrons usually have toward a local stock company—a sort of matinee girl's worship of the leading man and woman. We, all men and women, boys and girls have our favorites in the moving pictures whatever company it happens to be.

If you have ever observed the people watching the photoplays you will notice that there is never a moment of restlessness. It is a wonderful study in faces. Young and old reflect the emotions displayed in the pictures to such an extent that one could almost know what character of picture was being shown merely from watching the audience. But when the curtain goes up for a vaudeville turn then there seems to be a general restlessness and an air of tolerance only is assumed toward the performer. The hand-clapping is done these days, not for the performer, but for the picture.

Other theaters that have become 5 cent places are the National, formerly on the Sullivan & Considine circuit; the American and the Central, the biggest theater of its kind in the city. It is all on one floor, having no balcony or gallery. The Empress (S. & C.) and the Orpheum are practically the only houses here that haven't been reduced to 5 and 10 cents.

Out in the Mission district there, which is alive with picture houses, there is one enterprising man (Mr. Davis, part owner with his brother of a cozy little house), who has more fun out of the pictures than anybody I know. He stands on the balcony by the operating room and through a large megaphone tells the story of the pictures in his own particular picturesque language. He is naturally both dramatic and witty, so that in serious and comedy pictures he is equally good. He calls his talks "lectures," but there is nothing dull or wearisome as we sometimes imagine lectures to be. He is the only one in the city following the idea.

There was a picture house here some months ago called the "Electric," using talking pictures. There were four members of the company that stood behind the curtain and talked for the performers in the pictures. It was very entertaining, but the leading man told me that the manager of the theater thought that the profit was not sufficient to justify him in continuing it.

The most extensive failure to be recorded in the history of San Francisco's picture houses is the recent closing of Joe Bauer's $10,000 house built about two months ago and run in opposition to the Bell (Independent), and the Lyceum (Licensed). It is a beautiful place, but it only ran six weeks owing to the fact that the Bell and Lyceum both have first run service and Bauer was unable to produce any first run too, so that his house soon got the reputation of having old pictures. The consequence was the falling off of the patronage to such an extent the place had to be closed.

The Mutt and Jeff pictures made a tremendous hit here. The Bell theater, which was the first in San Francisco to run them, just doubled its receipts the day they were exhibited.

ONA OTTO.

SEATTLE.

Manager Elwell announces that the Lyceum Theater, starting Sunday, July 29, 1911, will feature three vaudeville acts with three reels of moving pictures. The admission will remain the same, 10 cents.

Dave Cohen, of the Stag Theater, of this city, returned home July 10, 1911. Mr. Cohen has been East for a much needed rest and will be on the job again soon.

The Ideal Theater, formerly owned and controlled by Eugene Levy, has been sold to Messrs. Brown and Smyth of the Class (A) Theater of this city. Mr. Brown announces that the Ideal will be thoroughly re-decorated and re-modeled throughout, and the name will be changed to the "Black Cat" Theater. The house seats 230 people and is very pretty.

Five motion pictures were shown during the week of July 17, 1911, of the Child Welfare Exhibit at the Coliseum Theater under the auspices of the Mothers' Congress. Several of them were commercial films, including the fight of a city for health, the education of a youth by a city, the experiences of a dog at Hull House Settlement, and the use of pure milk. Miss Anna Louise Strong, of Chicago, Ill., lectured with the pictures. Mrs. A. M. Quigley presided. Two seven-minute talks were given, one by C. J. France on "The Curfew Bell," and one by Probation Officer Lilburn Merrill on "Probation Work." The musical program is in charge of Miss Lucy K. Cole, of the public schools. As one of the features of the "Golden Potlatch" the motion pictures are attracting crowds that pack the theater every morning while the exhibition is in progress. The exhibit is said to be the only one of its kind in the country, educating the parents by means of motion pictures rather than by lectures.

The motion pictures of the Wolgast-Moran fight, pulled off at San Francisco on July 4, are the attraction at the Ideal Theater. Eugene Levy, who outbid all other competitors for the State rights to the fight films, will continue to show them at the Ideal Theater the week of July 17.

The Pastime Theater opened July 15, and is one of the most modern photoplay theaters to be found on the Pacific Coast. There has been no expense spared in arranging every little detail for comfort and convenience. The entrance to the Pastime is of antique mission style, presenting a very nice appearance. Mr. Frank Stebbing is proprietor and manager of the Pastime, and has secured the very best of film service from the Pacific Film Exchange of this city.

The following officers were elected for the ensuing year, of Local 154 I. A. T. S. E.: W. W. Ladd, president; H. F. Lampman, vice-president; Thos. Kennedy, secretary; C. C. Farmer, treasurer; Chas. Doyle, business agent; G. A. Smith, sergeant-at-arms: Jay Haas, L. L. Goldsmith, E. W. Jones, trustees: Art Lamhson, C. P. Mervin, delegates to Labor Council.

The Lois Theater opened during the "Golden Potlatch," with motion pictures for the week. The feature of the bill was Vitagraph's release, "A Klondike Steal." They had a very pretty lobby display.

The theaters have been putting in a very bad week of it during the "Golden Potlatch," in spite of the exceptionally good bills at all the local vaudeville and picture houses' attendance has been poor. The out-of-door attractions have been too strong in opposition. Mr. W. H. Harbeck, official motion picture photographer, has made 4,000 feet of "Potlatch" events. Much of this material was taken on First, Second and Third Avenues, while the parades were passing on Wednesday, Thursday, Friday and Saturday. About 100,000 people will have the joy of seeing themselves in the motion pictures, as the Coliseum Theater will show the picture for one week.

Manager Levy, of the Levy Amusement Company, returned last week from Spokane, after looking after the interest of the Spokane Theater, and reports that it will open September 3rd, 1911. Mr. Sam. B. Cohen will manage the Spokane Theater and Mr. W. M. Hartford will be chief operator.

Manager "Dad" Russell, of the Alhambra Theater, held a "Baby Show," during the week of July 23rd, as a special attraction.

The Savoy Theater, owned by W. P. Spurrier, has closed, a fire in the operating booth destroying four reels of film and the projecting machines. As Mr. Spurrier's lease has but one month to run, it is doubtful if he will re-open.

L. L. GOLDSMITH.

PITTSBURG, PA.

Everything and anything to advertise a moving picture house, seems to be the watchword of Geo. Balsdon, the alert manager and proprietor of the Photoplay Advertising and Specialty Co., Inc., at 121-123 Fourth Avenue. This concern is considered to be the largest and oldest photoplay advertising concern in existence in the United States. With two offices in Pittsburg, two in Cleveland and one in Detroit, this firm is in position to handle the wants of exhibitors in the Middle Western States. Their shingle reads, "Signs, show cards, song slides, banners, posters, heralds, and all display advertising for the photoplay house." This concern represents The Besely Co., of New York, with their extensive line of stereopticons and stereomotographs, and also Henuegan's exclusive advertising matter.

On July 30th, 1911, Meyers Lake, Canton, Ohio, extended its hospitality to the gayest bunch of moving picture exhibitors and employees ever assembled for the purpose of having a good time. Every one was there with the bells on, every one was cheerful and happy, and every one had a dandy day. The Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of Pennsylvania, are to be congratulated for their enterprise in choosing such a beautiful spot to throw off the seriousness of the week and to have a real day of happiness. This was their first annual picnic. The trip was taken via Wabash R. R., special train, leaving at 8.00 A. M., returning, left Canton at 7.30 o'clock.

Wm. James visited the offices of the Exhibitors' League on Friday, July 21. Mr. James is as hale and hearty as he has been noted to be. Business at The Oxford, Uniontown, Pa., owned and managed by Mr. James, has shown a great degree of improvement.

The Pastime Theater, at 101 Washington Avenue, Allentown, Pa., is as neat and as well managed house as can be found anywhere. This house has a seating capacity of 300, and is very well ventilated. The projection department consists of an Edison one-pin machine in a regulation asbestos booth. The lobby is very neatly decorated, and a judicious display of the posters of the day's run add a great deal to its attractiveness. Three good runs Independent pictures form the program for an admision of 5 cents, but it is contemplated to cut down the program to two reels as soon as arraugements can be made with the two competing houses. Messrs. Pfancook, Bowers & Megown are the proprietors. Mr. Megown is the manager, while Mr. Bowles takes charge of the projection department. Mr. Megown is also corresponding secretary of The Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of Pennsylvania, and is a staunch adherent of straight moving pictures as a program.

The Reliable Theater, at Millvale, Pa., with its silvered screen and with the projection under the personal charge of its owner, has, beyond a doubt, the clearest and best projected picture in Millvale. The Reliable is located at 515 Grand Avenue, and can run to about 240 seating spectators and 50 standing. An asbestos No. 2 booth, equipped with an Edison one-pin machine, are the projection equipments. Three reels of Licensed films are used. Mr. Thos. J. Barbin is the manager and proprietor. He is also the vice-president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Pennsylvania.

To encourage recognition of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League to exhibitors in general, James Clark, general manager of the Pittsburg Calcium Light & Film Co., stated that he would allow a special discount on all machines bought by exhibitors who can show their membership in the League.

A very regrettable accident occurred to Mr. Oliver Mckee, the manager and proprietor of Mckee's Theater, on Southern Avenue. While hanging the banner advertising the opening day of his newly remodeled theater, he happened to fall and sustained a severe fracture of the leg, which will confine him to bed for about five months. Mr. Harry Mckee will take charge of the theater during his father's convalescence. Mr. Mckee is one of the oldest and most popular exhibitors in the city. All the members of the Motion Picture League, of which he is a member, extend their deepest sympathy.

The offices of The Pittsburg Photoplay Co. were honored by a visit of none other than the hustling business manager of The Imp Co., namely, Mr. Julius Stern, the other day. Mr. Stern, while on a business trip to Chicago, stopped off to see some of this city's moving picture enterprises, and incidentally to invite Mr. Davis, of The Independent Film Exchange, and Mr. Lande, of the Pittsburg Photoplay Co., to a private exhibition of the Imp masterpiece, "The Call of the Song." It is stated that special music has been arranged for this film which will greatly add to its value. Mr. Stern took a trip down to the two foremost Independent theaters in the downtown section, and his opinion of them (the Olympic and the Minerva), is very flattering to Pittsburg's moving picture circle.

Mr. J. M. Remally, the progressive manager and owner of the Temple Theater, Greensburg, Pa., reports that business is pretty good round his way, considering the heat. The seating capacity of the Temple is 189, and standing room for about fifty more. The program consists of two reels Licensed films. The projection is fairly good, an Edison one-pin machine being used, in a regulation asbestos booth. This house is also well ventilated and equipped with necessary exits and aisles.

F. J. Herrington has severed his connection at the Alhambra Theater, on Southern Avenue, Mt. Oliver, and his partner, Mr. J. E. Wilkinson, will take complete charge as manager and proprietor. The Alhambra is a sister theater to the Coliseum, about a block away, having been built at the same time. The seating capacity is 285. The projection is very good, an Edison one-pin machine being used for this purpose. The lobby is very attractive and is used for judicious display. Two rear-end side exits insure perfect safety to patrons.

Moving picture projection at the Family Theater has improved wonderfully since last week, the bill on this week is also exceptional.

The Kursaal has just received a new process curtain by the Premier Scenic Co., manufacturers of the silver glaze daylight picture screens. This firm have also recently installed their curtains at The Reliable Theater, Millvale, Olympic and American theaters, Braddock, Nickelodeon Theater, Smithfield Street, Novelty Theater, N. S., Star Theater, Greencastle, and The Park View Theater, N. S.

EDDIE WHEELER.

LOS ANGELES.

M. H. Newman has just returned from Arizona, where he made a three-weeks' trip in the interest of the Co-operative Film Manufacturing Company. He reports that be obtained some good concessions.

The Selig Company, which recently went to the Santa Cruz Islands, returned to the studio last Saturday. Every one was in good health, even Fred Huntley, who was confined to the hospital at Santa Barbara, while the company was out taking pictures. The trip was reported as a huge success, some excellent marine pictures having been obtained. Members of the company report that they never saw such beautiful scenery as they did on this trip and that the coming pictures will be a surprise in the way of marine studies. About four reels were obtained. The Company was fortunate enough to arrive on the day the steamship Santa Rosa ran into the bank. A number of pictures were obtained of the boat when it split in half. The Selig Company in Yosemite Valley are expected to leave for Los Angeles very soon. The company has made a good showing, sending in quantities of film.

Miss Belnap, the young woman who was recently appointed life guard at the beach, has been engaged by the Pathe Company, to take part in a series of marine pictures. A picture was taken last week in which she appeared. She rescued the occupants of a canoe which was tipped over. The picture was exceedingly realistic, as Joe De Grasse, who was in the canoe before it tipped, can testify.

Frank Shaw, formerly with the Edison and Selig companies, has been engaged by the Pathe Company. Considering his long experience, he should prove a valuable man.

Last Sunday, the Bison Company, which is at present in Bear Valley, caused a panic among the campers at that resort, when they appeared as a band of renegade Piute Indians. Hearing the war-whoops of the supposed Indians, the campers fled in terror, believing that they had escaped from a reservation and were on the warpath. In the height of excitement, the Indians engaged in battle. So terrified were the campers that two of them, who were new comers, ran five miles to another camp. When they returned with a party, they found, instead of scalpless forms of their fellow campers, the mountain visitors calmly watching the battle.

Frank Montgomery, who had been an inmate of the Pacific Hospital for the past week, was discharged and is now on his way to Bear Valley to join the Bison Company. The company reports that it has had some bad weather, which has interfered with the work. However, conditions seem to be favorable to keep the company busy for some time to come.

New Moving Picture Ordinance.—After a long and strenuous fight, the local motion picture exhibitors have convinced the city council that it would not be right for them to pass the ordinance requiring them to secure permits from the police commission in order to run their businesses. The other sections of the ordinance providing for an advisory committee or board of censors, was passed. This board is to consist of five members, one each to be appointed by the mayor, police commission, board of education, Los Angeles Civic Association and The Southern California Motion Picture Men's association. All films will be censored before being exhibited to the public.

Church Films.—A novelty in church services was enjoyed Sunday evening at the Salem Congregational Church on East Twenty-eighth Street, when moving pictures were shown. Rev. B. H. Reutepohler had been denied a permit again and again, until a few days ago, when the city council declared churches having aisles of a ceratin width would be allowed to exhibit pictures. Three pictures were shown, including "Easter Babies," "Gorges of Tarn," and "Athaiah, Queen of Judea." One of the members of the choir sang an illustrated song entitled, "Don't Forget to Drop a Line to Mother." These entertainments will continue every Sunday and Thursday night during the summer. The views selected for all of the services will be both scenic and educational. No pictures will be shown that will not be in keeping with the spirit of the occasion.

Educational Films.—To illustrate his course of lectures, "See America First," Adam Dixon Warner has taken moving pictures of some of the most beautiful spots in Los Angeles. With his moving picture machine now on an automobile, now on a special car, Mr. Warner took views of the business streets and the parks and boulevards. These pictures will be shown all over the country. In addition to the pictures of California, Mr. Warner has secured views of Oregon, Washington, Idaho, Nevada, Utah, Arizona, Colorado and Alaska, and the beautiful Hudson river. Mr. Warner has delivered his lectures all over the country. He is a Los Angeles man and has practiced law in this city for eight years.

Blaming the Pictures.—The police of Los Angeles have arrested two young men on a charge of murder, which they attribute to the influence of moving pictures. Both young men in question, worked for a local moving picture exhibitor, who declares that the probable reason for the crime lies in the fact that they were afraid to work and not because they witnessed any hold-up scenes.

Independents Lose a Good Customer.—The Bijou, Main, near Sixth, commencing Monday, the week of July 17, will show Licensed pictures. This theater, for the past year or more, has never run anything but Independent releases. Mr. Quinn, the proprietor, states that his only reason for changing is, that he thinks he can better his business. He will run three second-run pictures.

At the last meeting of the local men's Moving Picture Association, W. Nixon resigned as president. He did not appear in person, but sent his resignation in by letter. His resignation was accepted. The association reorganized and the following were elected: Arthur S. Hyman, president; Judge Tugwell, vice-president and Mr. Kaiser secretary. The executive committee consists of all the officers with the addition of M. Stutz.

M. Stutz, of the firm of Stutz & Campbell, proprietors of the Shell moving picture theater, was arrested recently, charged with violating that section of the city ordinance which makes it a misdemeanor to exhibit signs without wooden backs. Mr. Stutz was given time to plead to the charge. He declares it is his intention to make a test case of his trial and if necessary, to appeal to the supreme court in order to have the ordinance repealed. Mr. Stutz contends that, as his signs are not over the property line, the city ordinance does not cover his case.

At last a movement has been started in this city to eradicate the five-cent novels of the Nick Carter type. Rev. Tyler Dennett appeared before the library board recently and asked them to co-operate with him. President Henry M. Newmark has declared his intention of joining the fight.

M. Rutner, assistant manager of Miles Film Exchange, of San Francisco, is visiting Los Angeles with his wife. They are the guests of Mr. Stutz.

The first moving pictures ever shown in connection with religious services in a Los Angeles church, were exhibited last Sunday at the Salem Congregational church, Twenty-eighth and Paloma Streets. They were under the personal direction of Rev. B. H. Reutepohler, the pastor. Despite the warm weather almost one thousand persons witnessed the innovation. Two comic and one drama pictures were shown. Between pictures, brief remarks were made by the pastor. The success attained by this cuhrch, which intends to give a free entertainment each Thursday evening, in addition to the Sunday evening services, has attracted the attentiou of the other Protestant churches of the city and the plan of combining to give free entertainments each evening during the week for both children and adults, is being seriously considered.

In this manner, in furnishing amusement and recreation, as well as religious principles, it is thought that the churches may be made a more vital factor in the lives of the people. Rev. Rentepohler, in speaking of the innovation, said: "I conceived the idea of picture shows in churches several years ago, when I was in Spokane, Wash., and it has only been since I came to this church last September, that I have been able to put it into practice." In addition to the congregation, a group of children from Washington Home Finding Society, were present. Rev. Reutepohler stated, following the service: "I wish to be put on record that I believe the moving picture theaters generally are doing great good. They attract from the saloons and other bad places and are stimulating to the imaginative powers."

INDIANAPOLIS.

E. J. Cayior has received a permit from the city for the construction of an airdome in Martindale Avenue, near Twenty-third Street. It will be open about August 1, and will seat about 500 people.

There are about 150 licensed moving picture operators in the city and there is some talk of forming an organization among them.

BOSTON.

Beacon Theater employees held their first annual outing at Paddocks Island, Sunday, July 23. A baseball match between married and single men was won by the former. There was an old fashioned fish dinner, at the hotel at which 39 plates were laid. Later the party went to Nantasket Beach and returned home in time for the first show at 6:30 P. M. The members of the Beacon Theater Co. were present during the festivities and Mr. Gilman, manager of the theater, umpired the ball game.

F. G. Collier has been appointed manager of the Old South and New Washington theaters, both on Washington Street. This position was held formerly by Nat Burgess.

George Delmore, in charge of the picture programs of the Bowdoin Square and Howard theaters, has returned from a three-weeks' vacation in Maine and New Hampshire and is again hard at work.

Manager Commeford, of the Bowdoin Square Theater, is on a two-weeks' vacation in Maine.

NEW ENGLAND NOTES.

C. W. Sheak has taken charge of the Relay Theater, at Nahant, Mass.

The Pavilion Theater, Greenwood Garden, Peaks Island, Me., is pleasing large crowds with pictures. N. J. McGelway is in charge.

The Salem Theater, Salem, Mass., closed Aug. 3 for repairs, during which the regular program will be given at the Empire Theater. Manager Dan Landry, of the Salem, says that he cannot complain of the business done.

Manager DeMarra, of the firm of Toomey & DeMarra, operating the Nickel Theater, Lawrence, Mass., entertained a party of Elks on July 27.

Coronation pictures from the Green Exchange with vaudeville and other good Independent pictures, were the program for a special performance at the Broadway Theater, Everett, Mass., on Aug. 21. Nat Brown is manager.

Manager John Keon, of the Comique Theater, Salem, Mass., has very cleverly succeeded in painting and renovating his house without closing.

HENRY.

ST. LOUIS.

The O. T. Crawford Co. has opened two elaborate and commodious airdomes. One is situated at Union and Easton Avenues, directly across the street from their photoplay house. It is well constructed and arranged, the stage is built of solid concrete throughout and enfringes on the street, so that the large arc lights which illuminate the exterior, do not effect the pictures as heretofore. The stage has always been erected in the rear of the airdome. The ground has been well sloped, and the stage is well viewed from the first seat to the last seat. The seating capacity is about 1,000. Mr. Dubbs is the manager.

The Aubert airdome, located at Aubert and Easton Avenues, is one of the latest to be opened in this locality. It is one of the finest in St. Louis. Its design is original and varies from all others as far as construction is concerned. The stage is built of concrete and sets extremely high, so that the pictures are visible by the people occupying rear seats. Its seating capacity is about 2,000, making it one of the largest in St. Louis. In the rear of the seats the management has provided chairs and tables for the convenience of the public, and have several waiters to serve the public with soft drinks, ice cream, etc. It is the first airdome to provide this convenience. The operator's booth is constructed of solid steel, and stands about 50 feet high. The management has also obtained special lenses from New York to make possible a 175-foot throw and give a clear picture. The pictures are wonderfully clear, considering the open air and the long throw. Directly in front of the box office a lamp post has been erected, upon which four flaming arcs have been hung. The long fence facing Easton Avenue, is studded with about 500 green lights, which adds to its beauty. The Aubert Airdome is showing Western Wheel Vaudeville and all first run pictures of the leading film companies.

The Whiteway Airdome, at 6th and Hickory, is playing to full houses on amateur nights, which are every Tuesday and Friday. There vaudeville and pictures are first class.

The Empress Airdome, located at Grand Avenue and Olive Streets, under the management of Heib & Kiley, is showing high-class vaudeville, furnished by The Westerd Vaudeville Association.

The Missouri Airdome, at Delmar and Hamilton Avenues, has booked The Great Lawrence Co., and chief trumpeter of the world, who was formerly chief trumpeter of Theo. Roosevelt's Rough Riders and also for Gen. Frederick Funsten and Gen. McArthur, of the Philippines. In addition to the above feature, the Missouri has booked some select motion pictures for this week.

The Hamilton Airdome, announces the appearance of Adair and DeArmand Co., in a comedy sketch entitled, "True to a Jockey's Color," for this week.

The Lyric Theater, at 6th and Pine Streets, has been showing the first photoplay that Miss Lawrence has appeared in for two weeks, entitled, "During Cherry Time." This was a special feature at the Lyric, and drew large crowds daily. The management also announces that they have obtained a set of special ground lenses which were made by the Gundlach-Manhattan Optical Co., of New York. These lenses are double size and project a picture fully two feet larger than the one in use previously. The Lyric has booked one of Edison's latest releases entitled, "Christian and Moor," for this week. This picture is laid in Cuba. Another film booked is, an "Aeroplane Disaster," which will prove interesting.

Mr. Elmer H. Coudy, manager of the Aubert Airdome, has organized a minstrel company, which played to large houses nightly at his emporium. Mr. Coudy has, with pains and care, cast together one of the best minstrel companies seen in this section for a long time. Mr. Geo. Weller, formerly of Lew Dockstader's Minstrels, is with this company and has made a big hit with his singing.

The Maple Airdome, at Kingshighway and Maple, entertained its patrons with some very high class vaudeville during the past week. Anna Buckley's dogs pleased the audience very much with their little drama. Rossley and Rostell amused the crowd with their comedy sketch. The star performance of the week was Mlle. Silverado, contortionist, who is said to be the most muscular woman in the world. The Maple has booked good vaudeville for the future.

Mr. C. W. Carter, manager of the Western Film Exchange, of Kansas City, spent several days in St. Louis this week. Mr. Carter avers that the photoplay houses in Kansas City, are meeting with great success owing to the cool weather for the past three weeks.

The St. Louis Times, a local leading daily, is featuring the photoplay houses with a special column three times a week.

OTTO SCHAEFER.

HARRISBURG, PA.

The New Victoria, owned by George Brothers is doing capacity business with first-run Independent service. James George, manager, is ever on the alert for that which pleases the patrons of the house. He is running Mutt & Jeff weekly to appreciative audiences.

The Lyric and Star have gone back to five-year-old Licensed film. This move is being watched with interest by the other exhibitors and if the old films draw the business, it is posible that all will go back to older service.

Manager Magaro, of the Bijou, has a force of carpenters at work putting in an inclined floor, which will add greatly to his popular little theater.

A. Branka, manager of the Photoplay Film Exchange, has made many improvements in his office, which will enable him to successfully handle his increasing business.

Chas. Adams, of Altoona, Pa., arrived in this city Sunday, and has taken the position of assistant manager of the Photoplay Theater.

G. W. Maun, special traveling representative for the Mirror screen, was a business caller in our city and Steelton, where he demonstrated the superior qualities of his screen.

Considerable excitement was caused over the "Rosary" film recently, when two of our local managers became mixed up in a much heated argument as to who was entitled to run the "Rosary." After telephoning to Pittsburg, the Theatorium ran the film, while Lenneys made explanations to their patrons as to why they advertised something they did not have.

Manager Miller, of the Summit Theater, continues to draw well with Independent service, running from four to seven reels in competition with three reels of Licensed pictures.

It is with regret that I am called upon to refer to the death of Mr. Douglass, one of the pioneers in the Cinematograph field, having been for many months connected with the Actograph Co., of New York, as manager of their Harrisburg branch, after which he went to Utica, N. Y., in the same capacity, returning here about a year ago, suffering with dropsy, from which he died on Saturday, July 29, after much suffering. His remains were taken to Boston, Mass., for burial.

The Arena, owned and managed by Rumpford & Rexroth, opened its doors to the public, and bids fair to do a big business. The seating capacity of the Arena is about 2,000. At present pictures only are run, but on or about September 4, vaudeville will be added and the admission price of 25c will be charged.

Mr. George Burket, part owner of the Lyric, has embarked in the fruit and candy business, having opened an elaborate store at the corner of Fourth and Chestnut Streets.

Well, it looks good. The operators have held a preliminary meeting; fifteen have signed the application for a charter and the same has gone into the grand office for final action. Here's hoping the boys will live long and prosper.

M. H. HILE.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

The Biograph players are working up some scenarios with views of the Capital City. Rock Creek Park appears to be one of the rendezvons. There are many pretty bits of scenery in the District of Columbia and vicinity that would make charming backgrounds for motion pictures.

As an illustration of what may be made in the financial end of motion picture business, one has simply to watch the full-page weekly advertisement of the Moore Amusement Company, which controls a chain of several houses here. This is costing no small money, and yet Mr. Moore finds it a paying enterprise. I do not know of any other company that has entered into advertising of picture houses so extensively. Indirectly, this is a boost for the industry, for the pages contain straightforward statements and scenes from the plays. W. H.

IN THE MISSISSIPPI VALLEY.

Freeport, Ill., theaters have been inspected again. The effect of this latest of the periodical examinations has varied with the temperament of the managers. The proprietor of the Grand Theater says he has changed his wiring three times to conform to inspectors' orders and that now the latest State official estimates that it needs about $6,000 worth of changes. Half of this is too high, retorts the manager, and avows rather than keep up with constantly changing wiring fashions, he will remodel it into a flat building. Another manager is quoted as willing to burn 3,000 feet of film in his operating room to convince the State inspector and the public that there is no danger from fire. The word of an electrician that this theater wiring is up to the Chicago or Minneapolis theater wiring, is offered. Manager Hopper, of the Lyric, has changed his wiring and added two exits as a result of the report.

Managers of Elgin, Illinois, photoplay houses, gave timely programs recently. Prior to the encampment of the Illinois National Guard, they poured upon their patrons everything available that breathed of militarism—battles, manœuvres and scenes of battleships. The same kind of programs, it was announced, would rule through the week of the encampment, one manager endeavoring to secure pictures of the big National Guard parade through the streets of Elgin two years ago.

Alex Johnson has opened a moving picture show on Tenth Street, in Waukegan, Ill.

F. Geele ,of Sheboygan, Wis., is at the head of a new $25,000 theater to be erected at North Eighth Street and Ontario Avenues, in Sheboygan.

Mrs. Abby Seaman Deeds is now singing at the Opera House moving picture show in Carlinville, Ill.

The advertising committee of the Elgin National Road races was seized with an idea of novel motion pictures. It was planned to secure, if possible, a film of a race between an aeroplane and an automobile, the views to be taken from a second aeroplane hovering above the racing flying machine. A proposition was made to the Chicago Aero Club and to the Chicago Moving Picture company, it is stated.

Four reels of film, seventy-five slides, a machine and other moving picture adjuncts, valued at $750, were destroyed when fire consumed the Lyric Theater, at Robinson, Ill. A stock company was playing when a piece of burning trash blew in at the back door and set fire to the scenery.

Samuel Ketz, who has been with the Varsity Moving Picture Company, in Cape Town, South Africa, has returned to his home at Champaign, Ill. He reports the company, which is a Champaign concern, as successful in the foreign field.

Look where the Rockford Republic places the moving picture. In announcing that a theater there will no longer be a home to "Lottie, the Cloak Model," and her kindred, this sheet says: "The vaudeville houses and the picture shows have crowded the lower-priced and lower grade attractions off the boards."

George H. Gaskill has purchased Dell Rockford's interest in the Electric Theater, at Lewistown, Ill.

When the merchants of Shawneetown, Ill., decided to have a "market day," they rightfully decided that one of the best inducements to get people to town would be to arrange to have the local moving picture show furnish eutertainment for the visitors at the expense of the business men.

Dr. Frederick H. Wines, of Springfield, Ill., is one of the most prominent charitable workers in the United States. In his capacity as statistician for the Illinois Board of Administration he has a chance to see the needs of the unfortunate. Scarcely a convention of prison authorities, alienists, and those who care for State wards, is held in the country that he is not asked to speak. In an article in the Institution Quarterly, of which he is editor, he shows that moving pictures are of especial benefit to State charges, and adds:

"The Quarterly recommends the general use of this form of combined amusements and instruction in prisons, reformatories and institutions for the insane. The special schools for the deaf are moving along this line, and a considerable sum of money has already been subscribed to enable their pubils to profit by it. The moving picture is a feature of the Illinois State School and Colony for the feeble-minded at Lincoln. The Kansas State Hospital for Epileptics has purchased a machine for the entertainment of patients and a picture show is given several times each month."

The Vaudette, Springfield, Ill., W. W. Watts, manager, makes a feature of local "daffydils," such as have been prevalent in the newspaper eartoons. Patrons are invited to send in their puns on the names of local people, which are projected from slides.

HOT TIME AHEAD AT RED OAK, IOWA.

S. C. Wallace, operator at the Beardsley Theater, Red Oak, Iowa, gives the Moving Picture World a graphic description of the keen competition existing between the picure theaters in his town:

"The picture business here in Red Oak is going at an awful pace. Both houses are fighting like a couple of four-year-old kids. Both are licensed and both run three reels; one changes every night and the other three times a week. One has an eight-piece orchestra, the other has the Red Oak military band of twenty-five pieces and an orchestra of ten pieces. We show from first-run to 30-day service and the General Film Co. is making more out of it than anyone else.

"We both ran 'Il Trovatore' and 'The Deluge,' first run, and if a house runs from one to three first runs weekly in a town of 5,000, it is going to kill the business if they keep the pace up. The projection is unusually good at both houses. We have direct current.

The people of Red Oak are sure getting their money's worth these days. They are show-goers, for both houses are nearly filled every night. The Beardsley has the advantage on Saturday nights, as it has a seating capacity of 800, while the Comet has only 400. We run two shows every evening and three on Saturday.

CHANGE AT LAKE CHARLES, LA.

Mr. James P. Pittman, proprietor of the Imperial Theater, Lake Charles, La., recently sold his house to Messrs. Pearce and Lyons, owners and managers of a long string of fine picture houses throughout the South. The new proprietors will assume charge about July 27th and will close the house for extensive repairs, reopening it about August 10th, to be known as "Pearce's Dreamland." Mr. Ned E. Depinet, who has been identified with some of the licensed film exchanges in New Orleans, will manage the house. The latest licensed picture will be shown, accompanied by a five-piece orchestra.

EL CAJON VALLEY FLUME.

Commenting upon a coming picture, "The Poisoned Flume," the American Film Company points out the fact that the flume in question is the big conduit which supplies all the water for the El Cajon valley. This flume is more than 100 miles long and is fed by the waters of Cuyamaca Lake, far up in the mountains. This interesting fact adds a touch of the educational to the picture.

Other interesting subjects to be released by the American are "The Brand of Fear," "The Ranch Girl" and "The Outlaw," all of which are said to contain many thrilling incidents.

Last week we advertised a novel Western release for Tues. Aug. 8, The Vaudeville Hit known as

"Cheyenne Days"

A Broncho Busting and Lariat Throwing act now going big on the Keith and Percy Williams time.

On Sat. Aug. 12, we follow up with our Regular Saturday Indian Picture Release

Lone Eagle's Trust

THEN—On Tues. Aug. 15, The Children's Reel

Babes in the Wood

The old, old story that is ever young and of which children never tire. A real treat for the Kiddies and one they all deserve.

Produced under the direction of Mr. Fred Walton, the well known Pantomimist of many years experience in England and U. S.

It is one of those pictures that the Exhibitor can book again and again—while for the Exchange it is an investment that will pay dividends for years to come.

On Sat. Aug. 19—Our Regular Indian Story

The Squaw's Devotion

The story of a white man's bravery and a half-breed's cowardice—proving once again that faint heart never won fair lady nor fair squaw, for both are women.

A Nature Picture that will please all lovers of the free open life of the primeval forest, with just enough adventure to make it thrilling. : : : :

An Amusing and Interesting Split Reel for Tues. Aug. 22

Measuring a Wife

A humorous phase of early western days when women were more scarce than policemen and the choosing of a wife was usually a Hobson's choice.

On the same reel

The Falls of Bohemia

A beautifully photographed view of these historic falls.

ESSANAY.

LOVE IN THE HILLS (Aug. 8).—Living with her two brothers in the Kentucky hills, Doris Stevens meets Tom Rogers, a young surveyor, and both fall in love. Rogers is working with another surveyor, and their tent is pitched several miles up the river, and though Rogers often meets Doris, he has never visited her in her home and for that reason has never met her brothers. The two become engaged and it is with the intention of calling at Doris' home to meet her brothers when he receives a letter from his father to hurry home immediately, as his mother is very ill. Tom hastily pens a note and gives it to a boy, with an explanation to Doris regarding his hasty departure for the city. The boy loses the note and Doris, who has been worried about Tom's absence, confesses to her brothers her fears that Tom has deserted her. The brothers in a rage decide to find Tom and bring him back to Doris and force him to marry their sister. They arrive at the tent of the two surveyors and seeing Jackson, Tom's friend, think he is Tom and drag him unceremoniously back to their house, refusing to listen to any explanation from Jackson. However, Tom arrives on the scene, just in the nick of time, when explanations are made to the brothers, who apologize for their conduct.

THE GORDIAN KNOT (Aug. 11).—Marion Walters and Harry Robbins are in love. Robbins is a promising young contractor and has the esteem of Marion's father, a shrewd old fellow who wants to see the young people happy and see Marion married before he dies. The happy prospects are quashed, however, when Elizabeth, Marion's older sister, elopes with a young man of the village, leaving a note stating that she feels Marion will surely not care to marry as long as her father is alive, whereat Marion breaks off her engagement with Harry, despite his pleas and her father's endeavor to change her mind. A plan is finally concocted in the back room of the drug store, with Doctor Finney's assistance. Walters has driven into town with Marion and has persuaded her to go driving with Harry. After they are out of sight, the old man is carried out of the drug store, helped into a buggy and driven home by the doctor, while the news is spread that Walters is dying. The young couple are sent for and arrive home, where Marion finds her father apparently gasping out his last breath, in which he asks her to marry Harry immediately. A preacher is there and the ceremony is conducted, after which the old man springs to his feet and tells them of his conspiracy. Marion's wrath is soon appeased and the happy couple are congratulated by all present.

THE RANCHMAN'S SON (Aug. 12).—Allen Harley, a young ranchman, quarrels with Pete Lewis, a puncher, in a saloon and finally, when Lewis is insultinng, Harley knocks him down. Lewis then slinks out of the saloon and encounters Jake Webster, with whom he also has a quarrel. Guns are drawn and the result is the death of Lewis, when Webster accidentally discharges his weapon. Harley later comes on the scene and at first thinking that Lewis is in a drunken sleep kicks his feet, laughing, and then discovers that Lewis is dead. Harley is crouching beside the body of Lewis, with the gun in his hand when the sheriff arrives and arrests him, charging him with the murder. Harley is locked up and the real criminal, Webster, rides hurriedly away. Arriving at the Harley ranch, he applies for a position here and is given work. A few days later, when old man Harley is worrying about his son, a newspaper is handed him announcing the finding of the jury in his son's trial. Harley has been found guilty and has been sentenced to be hung at sundown. Webster finds the paper, and after struggling with his conscience resolves to ride to the county seat and save young Harley's life. He arrives at the jail just in the nick of time, confesses, and young Harley is granted his freedom.

PATHE.

AN UP-TO-DATE ELOPEMENT (Aug. 7).—This remarkable comedy is one of the funniest things ever put on the screen. A little fellow elopes with an enormous woman in his 120 horsepower automobile and finally the thing blows up. All the time the father of the girl has been in pursuit, but when the machine explodes they go where he cannot follow.

THE FLAMING ARROWS (Aug. 9).—Polly visits a ranch in the West and the cowboys all fall in love with her—one in particular, but he is too bashful to tell her so. On the day she departs for her home in the East they are attacked by Indians on the way to the station and a great fight ensues, in which the bashful cowboy proves a hero. All finshes in the way most people like to have a story finish, with everybody happy.

FIDELITY (Aug. 10).—A mother and child live alone except for a big St. Bernard dog. One day the little girl dies and both mother and the little girl's playfellow, Don, seem grief-stricken. Later, in order to pay the rent, Don is sold, but is not happy in his new home, and day by day carries flowers in his mouth to the grave of his former little mistress, where he is finally found by his former owner's mother and they are never parted again.

THE UNEXPECTED GIFT (Aug. 11).—Away in Provence is a mother left childless by the death of two of her children. That Sunday at mass, she tells the curate of the parish of her great sorrow. Strange to say, that same day a little baby was left at the door of the church by unknown hands. The curate, being a kind-hearted man, makes a great big egg, puts the baby in, ties it up with a ribbon and sends it with a little note to the childless mother.

BILLY'S MARRIAGE (Aug. 12).—Billy is in love with a lawyer's daughter, but the lawyer cannot see Billy for a moemnt. Finally Billy disguises himself and entering the lawyer's office tells him he is in love with a girl whose father refuses to give his consent, and pays two hundred dollars for the lawyer's advice as to what to do. The lawyer advises him to elope, which Billy promptly does, with the lawyer's daughter. After many exiciting adventures they are married, and when the irate father is about to kick Billy out, he springs his father-in-law's legal advice on him and all is settled satisfactorily.

IN THE PARIS SLUMS (Aug. 14).—A young woman, who is an animal trainer, is seen by one of the Paris toughs, who falls in love with her. He makes an appointment with her at a dance hall, but when she arrives she is claimed by another apache. A fight ensues and to settle matters the animal trainer takes both to her tent and throws a rose into the leopard cage, offering her heart to the one that regains it. The retrieving of the rose is a most thrilling picture.

THE TRAPPER'S FATAL SHOT (Aug. 16).—The trapper and his little daughter and her big brother live together in a log cabin in the wilds. One day, while the men are absent, the cabin is attacked by Indians and the little girl stolen. When she reaches the Indian camp, she is put in charge of an old Indian to whom she rendered a service months before. He attempts to return her to her father, who has discovered his loss and is on the hunt for the savages. Seeing his daughter in the distance in the company of an Indian, the trapper drops on his knee and taking a long shot kills the old redskin, who is returning his daughter.

THE AD, THE MAID AND THE MAN (Aug. 17).—A young lady gets a position as a stenographer in a broker's office; the cashier makes a fool of himself and forces his attentions upon the young lady, who promptly slaps his face. This, of course, results in an investigation and the cashier is discharged. The young lady is thus brought to the notice of her employer and, being pretty, ere long a romance springs up which ends delightfully as all romances should.

SATAN'S RIVAL (Aug. 18).—Satan is weary and decides to seek the excitement of the social world; consequently he changes himself into a Hindoo prince and with many gifts asks the hand of the daughter of the ruler of a nearby kingdom. The young lady, however, is in love with another fellow and refuses, much to her father's displeasure. There ensues a war of wits between Satan and the accepted lover of the girl, and Satan wins until the young man appeals to the church to help him, when Satan is finally overthrown.

THE MESSAGE OF THE ARROW (Aug. 19).—There is a plot between some white men and a renegade Indian to steal certain Indian lands. This plot is foiled by a cowpuncher, who thus incurs the enmity of the plotters. One of them attempts to assassinate him, but the would-be assassin is shot by an Indian maid just in the nick of time. She escapes and the cowpuncher is held for murder. The little redskin is hiding in a cave by one of her tribe, who wants to see the cowpuncher hung. She writes a message, however, on a portion of her clothing, ties it to an arrow and shoots the arrow into space. This is found and leads to the ultimate release of the unfortunate cowpuncher.

BIOGRAPH.

THE RULING PASSION (Aug. 7).—Little Billy has been taken to the theater by his parents and as a result becomes stage-struck. At a children's party Billy plays stage manager and drills the children in some of the scenes he has witnessed. Later in the day while playing on the lawn the idea strikes him to play the drama with realism, so they go down to the shore and use a rowboat for a pirate ship, seizing his sister and placing her aboard. This is considered great, until the boat breaks from its mooring and little brother and sister are carried by the rough sea far out from the shore. As his parents are away on a visit to the city, it is some time before Billy can secure aid. Upon their return, papa, after an exciting sail in a motor boat, rescues them.

THAT DARE DEVIL (Aug. 10).—Dan's Sweetheart forces him to become a hero by pushing him into the park lake, into which a child has fallen. The water is shallow and Dan manages to drag the little one to the shore. For this deed he is rewarded by being made a copper. A brave cop he is, too, when it comes to chasing little boys. One day he goes to the lake shore and indulges in a plunge. The boys find his uniform, and stealing it away place the coat on the wharf. This leads to the impression that he gave his life to save another's, and while they laud his apparent bravery, he is hiding in the bushes, clothed only in a bathing suit.

AN INTERRUPTED GAME (Aug. 10).—Baxter, to get away to join the boys in a little game of cards, tells his wife he is going to visit a sick friend. She gives him until ten o'clock. When he doesn't return she goes after him and consequently his friend has to play sick, receiving at the hands of Baxter's sympathetic wife mustard plasters, etc. For the time, the friend submits to the torture—but "never again!"

JEALOUS GEORGE (Aug. 14).—George White, a young architect, is insanely jealous of his innocent and beautiful wife.

As a sort of a peace offering, after one of these stormy hours in an otherwise serene household, George buys an expensive opera coat and picture hat, which he presents to his forgiving spouse.

The same day, the wife, being indisposed, retires. Her maid, Jane, grasps the opportunity to take a half holiday, and takes the liberty of wearing Madame's new hat and coat.

Later George catches a glimpse of Jane and her beau strolling down the street. He recognizes the hat and coat, and naturally supposes the wearer to be his wife. This drives him into a jealous rage and dropping his work he starts in rapid pursuit.

Losing track of the pair he proceeds to his home, where he encounters his wife, who insists she has been ill at home all day. While the young architect is berating her, the maid enters and confesses her part in the mix-up.

A TURKISH CIGARETTE (Aug. 14).—A wandering tramp (Mr. Walton) is given a Turkish cigarette, which causes him to fall asleep. He dreams of being transplanted into a moorish harem, and his experiences are excruciatingly funny.

THE REGENERATION OF APACHE KID (Aug. 15).—The home of a frontier family is suddenly attacked by Apache Indians, who kill the parents, set fire to the house and carry off the small boy. He is raised to believe himself an Indian and becomes the leader of his tribe.

Fifteen years later, we discover him a man, grown. While on a raid, he and the Indians see the wagon of a settler and give chase. They overtake it, kill the driver and burn the wagon.

Col. Worthington receives a message that "Apache Kid" is responsible for this. Two scouts discover the burning wagon, and a dead white man. The troop soon arrives and sally forth in search of the Indians. The cavalry captures "Apache Kid" and his foster father, Old Chato.

At the barracks, the ladies become very much interested in the "Kid" when they learn he is of white origin. Mary, the colonel's daughter, believes there is some hope for him; she persuades her father to send for him. Of course, the colonel cannot refuse Mary.

They are brought into the room, and Mary insists upon removing the chains. She further requests that the "Kid" be allowed to occupy her brother's room that night. When left alone, he sees Mary's picture and it has a strange power over him.

A year later we find the "Kid" a regular soldier and improving rapidly under the tuition of Mary, whom he loves with the devotion of a faithful dog. One day she received a letter from her fiance that he is coming, and urges their marriage hastened. She explains this to the boy, and he, thinking only of his own great love for her, fairly stuns her with his declaration. She orders him to leave at once.

Life holds nothing more now for the "Kid," and he cannot rise above his disappointment. He goes to the foothills.

The lieutenant next day finds his body. He had learned to love, but in vain.

THE BLACKSMITH'S LOVE (Aug. 17).—The Civil War has begun, and Mace Brewer goes to the front, leaving his young wife alone. His friend, Joe Saunders, also has to leave his aged mother and answer the call of duty to his country.

The misfortunes of war claim Mace, and at night as Joe, sorely wounded, limps off the battlefield, he leaves Mace for dead. Soldiers burying the dead, discover life in Mace and he is hurried to the hospital, where the surgeons succeed in reviving him.

Thinking Mace dead, Joe writes to his mother of this tragedy, and she sadly shows the letter to the wife. Joe returns. Mace's widow calls for the details of his death.

After recovering from the operation it is found that Mace's mind is affected, and he is taken to an asylum for treatment.

A year passes and we see Joe a sturdy blacksmith, being visited in his shop by his mother and the widow with whom he is plainly in love, but he lacks the courage to tell her so. Finally one Sunday on the way home from church, he manages to slip a note into her hand.

He has asked her to place a lamp in the window that night if his answer is to be "yes."

Fearfully Joe watches for that light and is overjoyed when it appears. Mary accepts him.

At the close of another year, Joe and Mary are supremely happy in the possession of a baby.

These two years have completely restored Mace Brewer to health and reason and he is discharged from the asylum. So he goes back to his home. Mace seeks his friend Joe. The horror of recognition almost makes a madman of Joe, and when Mary comes in and sees this man as if from the dead, the shock is so great she falls insensible upon the floor.

Poor Mary must decide between them. She loves Joe twofold, for himself and also because he is the father of her child. But old fashioned ideas of honor compel her to sorrowfully place her baby in the arms of the father, and to go with her lawful husband.

HOME IS BEST AFTER ALL (Aug. 14).—Accepting an invitation from their married daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Simpson left the farm and went to visit in her elegant city home. The old couple came up to the city prepared to enjoy its wonders and sights, but they had no sooner left the train than they found themselves the object of unpleasant curiosity. They could not understand this, for they had on their very best store clothes.

They arrived at their daughter's home, and were admitted by the butler, who responded to their questions with about as much expression as a wooden Indian. Their daughter received them graciously and gladly, so did her husband. Still, things didn't go as pleasantly as down on the farm. At the table, they became confused at the different kinds of knives, forks and spoons. The butler amirked and the maid tittered at their mistakes in table etiquette. They made all sorts of amusing errors.

When they reached their room, Mrs. Simpson was about ready to cry and Mr. Simpson was mad as a wet hen, by cracky! So they took the hull by the horns, wrote a note, and then slipped out of the house and away to the railroad station. Back at the farm once more, they found genuine pleasure in being able to live as they pleased in solid comfort without any regard to man-laid manners and customs.

THE AUTO BUG (Aug. 14).—Bud Williams was dippy about automobiling. He spent most of his time reading automobile catalogues and journals. He wanted to own a car, and finally he heard of a second-hand one for two hundred and fifty dollars, which was just the amount of money he had saved.

He started off gleefully to buy it. On the way, he met a man whose touring car was out of order. Of course Bud had to stop and hutt in. While he was so doing, the gasoline tank exploded, and the owner held Bud responsible for the accident. Poor Bud had to pay two hundred dollars damages. Fortunately, he saw another second-hand car advertised for fifty dollars and bought it. The car proved to have plenty of life. Bud found that he could not stop it, and he went riding about the town at a fearful rate. Finally out in the country, the thing exploded. The machine was blown to pieces, and Bud was blown out of sight. He was picked up by some farmers and taken to a "ting house." There the doctors and men of science examined him and found his poor head full of wheels.

THE INVENTOR (Aug. 15).—Poor man—working on valuable patents—wife becomes ill—he must send her to another climate—borrows money—sends wife to distant city. He continues work on invention. Debts come due—about to sell invention cheap—wife and little son find rich man's purse and return it—become acquainted—rich man buys invention for $50.000, and gives inventor a position at a high salary.

THE SON OF THE SHUNAMMITE (Aug. 19).—The woman of Shunem provides comforts for Elisha. The prophet seeks what good he may do for her—he prophesies the birth of a son—the child is born—when the child is grown he dies—Elisha restores the child to life. Scenes: 1. The Shunammite and her aged husband. 2. Elisha, the prophet, on a visit to Shunem, meets the woman, who gives him shelter and food. 3. And Elisha send Gehazi, his servant, to learn what he can do to repay the woman for her kindness. 4. Gehazi reports that the woman prays for a child. And Elisha prophesies that a son will be born to them. 5. And according to Elisha's prophesy a son is born. He prospers for ten years. While visiting his father in the fields the child is overcome by the heat. 6. He is taken to his mother and dies in her arms. 7. The mother places him upon the bed of Elisha, the prophet, and leaves him there. 8. Seeking out the prophet she vows she will not leave him until he restores her child. 9. Elisha prays for the restoration of life to the boy. 10. And the child is restored.

THE WASP (Aug. 14).—Susanne is hurt at her husband's indifferences and seeks consolation in an innocent flirtation with a young artist. Circumstances seem to combine to make her lark with the artist Redfern assume a serious aspect. Bernice Tesselver is a woman of thirty who has missed the great love of a woman's life and whose disposition has been hardened and soured until she has become known to the family as the Wasp. Redfern learns of the Wasp's arrival at the home of Susanne and the Wasp learns of Susanne's folly and determines to save her. Carrying out this plan the Wasp intercepts a note and realizes she must act quickly. Redfern recognizing Susanne's position decides to appeal to the Wasp by arousing the woman in her, but as the best laid plans of mice and men often miscarry, Redfern discovers that the Wasp is the woman he loves after all and Susanne eventually finds comfort and safety in her husband's arms.

SPECIAL MESSENGER (Aug. 16).—Royal, a gallant Southern lad, kisses his wife and mother goodbye and departs for the front. Two years later the young Confederate bearing dispatches through the enemy's country is discovered and pursued. Then follows a daring race for life and flag. His pursuers being thoroughly familiar with the country divide their forces, one part continuing after Royal, the other striking across country with a view to heading him off as he crosses a bridge. Royal eventually reaches the bridge and starts to cross. When he has about reached the middle, glancing ahead to the other end he sees he has been caught in a trap. A party of Union soldiers are blocking his way. To think is to act. Jumping his horse into the water, twenty-five feet below, he succeeds in reaching the bank of the river ahead of his pursuers. Making for a piece of woods close by, while his horse is going at a high rate of speed, he jumps and catches the limb of a tree, pulls himself up, hides in the branches and allows his horse to rush on. Not detecting the ruse, the Federals pursue the running horse and learn of the trick played upon them only after they have come up to him several miles distant. Desperately wounded Royal, who has been shot by the Federals while pursued by them, lies in hiding until night, when he manages to crawl to his own home not far distant. The Federals, however, are still on his trail. His wife and mother succeed in hiding him in the stable. The Federals come up, make a thorough search of the house and grounds and finally decide Royal has made a successful escape. The next day Royal's wife decides to deliver his messages herself, and after a narrow escape Nancy fulfills her husband's mission.

THE PROMOTER (Aug. 18).—Bertie's landlady is on a rampage. She wants her money, but Bertie is broke. At dinner that night one of the boarders, a would-be stock broker, explains the mining stock game to Bertie. The same evening the broker and two friends visit Bertie's room for a quiet poker game. Bertie winning all the money decides to go into the mining stock business, and the next day takes a desk with his broker friend in the office of the Bonanza Mining Co. Business is brisk, but much to Bertie's chagrin when the closing hour arrives, his broker friend takes the money. A few nights later Bertie gives a swell dinner in a nearby café. When the time arrives to pay the check all the guests quietly slip away, leaving Bertie to face the music. Being unable to produce the necessary funds, the manager of the café has Bertie arrested ,and his finale is a cold, dark cell in the police station.

MELIES.

THE LOCAL BULLY (Aug. 17).—"Roaring Bill" was the terror of Black Bear Gulch. The boys were in the habit of giving him his own way for fear of being made to dance to the tune of a five shooter. But all secretly disliked him, and were the first to laugh when the wit of a young Easterner presented the opportunity.

John Grey, a blithe young salesman, blew into the saloon as "Roaring Bill" was putting the "chink" through some stunts. Grey was a new target for Bill, and lest he come to some harm, the hotel-keeper led the young man into the next room to explain Bill's character. Grey was not the kind to be easily upset. He ordered a good meal and ate it, taking notice, of course, of the extremely pretty waitress.

Presently Bill entered and addressed an insulting remark to the waitress. Grey resented it and both were on their feet in a moment. Bill flourished his gun, but the salesman gave him an uppercut that sent him sprawling, and then unloaded his gun. Bill sneaked out of the room, swearing seven kinds of spectacular vengeance on the salesman. He was telling the boys in the bar-room what he was going to do to Grey, when a note arrived from the latter proposing a shot-gun duel, which would give an even chance to both.

Bill was for backing out of the use of shotguns, but any refusal on his part he knew would be jeered. The time arrived. They took one step backwards—two, and then— Would one believe it, Bill dropped the gun and ran?

Grey was a hero. Back to the hotel they took him and drank his health, after which he calmly opened his suitcase and displayed merchandise for sale. Did he sell? Well!

TWO FOOLS AND THEIR FOLLIES (Aug. 17).—Texas John was one, his wife the other. She vowed she'd go to the city to shop, and extracted a good size bankroll from him for that purpose. Her last words were, "Don't dare drink while I'm gone." But what a waste of words. John invited all his friends for a two-days' "tout," and they certainly made havoc of a once tidy home.

Two Fools and Their Follies (Melies).

Mrs. John returned, but no one knew it, for the simple reason that harem skirts do work wonders with old housewives. No one recognized her, save John, who knew her face when she smelled booze. Well, bottles and harem skirts flew about the air for a time, with the cowboys as an audience.

Finally both became exhausted in the struggle, and putting on their sane attire, raised two hands upward and repeated the familiar saying, "Never again." The boys were wise, and forming a group in the window, serenaded "a pair of fools."

VITAGRAPH.

FOR LOVE AND GLORY (Aug. 14).—Young Lieut. Osmond, of the British Army, is engaged to be married to Rose Seaton. His father objects. Later they are married, and Lieut. Osmond is denounced as his son. Rose Seaton's father dies of heart-failure superinduced by business troubles.

The young Lieut. is ordered to go to South Africa with his regiment to fight the Boers. In this battle he is killed. His wife receives word of his death, and at once apprises her father-in-law of his son's death and of her helplessness. He does not recognize her. While walking down the street, the old man loses his wallet, and his grandson, who happened to be walking behind him, picks it up and returns it to him.

He offers to adopt George (his grandson), but will not shelter his mother. For the sake of her boy she consents to his taking care of her son. As the mother is passing the old man's house one day, her son recognizes her, and running out of the house, clasps her to his bosom. The old man's heart is now touched, and subsequently takes her into his home.

CAPTAIN BARNACLE'S BABY (Aug. 15).—Disappointed at his failure to secure the young lady whom he intended to make his wife, Captain Barnacle becomes grouchy. He fears even the good offices of the Widow Marlin, who assists him in keeping his home neat and tidy.

The night is dark and stormy. The captain sits before the fireplace, meditating. A cry for help is heard. Hastily drawing on his rubber boots, putting on his oilskin coat and hat, he rushes to the beach just as the boat, filled with rescuers, is making its way to the sinking vessel. He shouts encouragement, fires the signal of approaching help and awaits the return of his brave companions. While pacing the sands, he catches sight of a raft which carries a small child out amid the breakers. Plunging into the foaming sea he tows the raft nearer the shore, lifts the little baby from it, and takes it to his home. The love of the little girl disperses his gloom and softens his heart, reunites him with his friends, bringing an element of happiness and contentment into his life.

MAN TO MAN (Aug. 16).—Black Bart, a desperado, is apprised of the fact that the sheriff is after him. Taking heed of the warning, he rushes off into the woods. But the sheriff has scented his trail, and the desperado is captured after a long chase and a hard struggle. As he is being led to jail they are obliged to ford a river, into which the desperado falls, and as he is helpless, the sheriff saves him from drowning.

Later they are attacked by hostile Indians. The sheriff releases the desperado, and together they fight the approaching redskins. One by one they fall. The ammunition of the sheriff is gone, and there is but one bullet left. That is in the desperado's gun. He now realizes that he has the "drop" on the sheriff, but remembering that the sheriff saved him from a watery grave when his hands were tied, he hands his gun to him. As the sheriff is turning the key, he feels that he is standing face to face with a man, who is deserving of a better fate.

VITAGRAPH MONTHLY OF CURRENT EVENTS (Aug. 18).—In this first issue we are treated to the pleasure of witnessing a head-on collision between two locomotives going at the speed of sixty miles an hour, just after the crews have jumped from their cabs. With terrific force they are interlocked with each other like two giant wrestlers.

Another feature is the games of the American Athletic Association, held at Pittsburg, for the national championship.

Furthermore we are brought face to face with President Taft at the LaCrosse games of the Crescent Athletic Club and reviewing the annual parade of the Sunday schools of Brooklyn, N. Y., presenting some of the activities of the life of the head of this great nation in encouraging the people in doing things that tend to make stronger and better citizens.

Besides all these, there is the National Aviation flights of the national aviators: and an actual fire scene of a stirring and thrilling character; and the marathon race at Coney Island.

THE SECOND HONEYMOON (Aug. 19).—Gladys Merwin, at the salesroom of a fashionable modiste, takes a fancy to a very pretty gown and orders it sent to her at once. Sadie Moore, immediately after Gladys has gone, enters the establishment, and seeing the dress which Gladys has just purchased, orders one for herself of exactly the same material and design.

Shortly after this prologue, Gladys and her husband, Jack Merwin, receive an invitation to spend part of their honeymoon at the home of Judge and Mrs. Brown; in honor of their visit, they are accorded a reception. Sadie Smith enters the hall room wearing the exact duplicate of Gladys' costume, escorted by a young man in whome she appears to be more than interested. Jack thinks Sadie is his wife and becomes disturbed. He is on the point of following them when Gladys appears in the doorway alone. He turns to his partner and makes violent love to her, in order to arouse the jealousy of Gladys. When bis wife sees him she becomes angry.

The next morning Gladys and Jack are not on speaking terms; they bid good-bye to Judge and Mrs. Brown, and leave for their home, where Gladys falls into her mother's arms weeping and telling of Jack's behavior. Each consider the other at fault; it is not long before tbey are divorced from each other.

The Browns, at whose bouse the qnarrel began, have not heard of their divorce; Jndge Brown invites Jack to spend a week-end with them, and Mrs. Brown sends an invitation to Gladys to he present on the same occasion. Both Jack and Gladys accept and attend but are entirely nnaware of each other's presence. They are both shown at different times to the same suite, and, later, when they are about to dress for the evening, Gladys finds on entering the ante-room, all of Jack's belongings; she throws them out and unpacks her own. When Jack comes into tbe room, he finds Gladys' wardrobe spread about and he gets rid of them and proceeds to make himself comfortable. Jack goes into the bedroom to shave. While he is doing tbis, Gladys comes in again and finds the male apparel, and, as before, disposes of it without ceremony. She then retires from the room. Jack enters and finding his own clothing gone, in a spirit of fun dresses himself in Gladys' clothing. Gladys returns to the sitting room, dressed in a frilled petticoat, short enough to display a pair of ankles, and her long hair is hanging in golden strands far below her waist. She does not see Jack hut he sees her; she goes to her bedroom; he peeps tbrough the door and is canght hy Gladys. She is enraged, bnt as she bebolds Jack, whom she now recognizes as her husband, dressed in her own clothing, she can't help hut laugh at the ridiculousness of the situation. He thinks Gladys bewitching. There is sues a lively explanation of the cause of their qnarrel and divorce, and both of them decide that they will be re-married by Judge Brown, start life again and enjoy a second honeymoon.

THE WINDS OF FATE (Aug. 15).—A gust of wind blows one of a number of bonds off tbe table, (upon which the young clerk placed tbem) under the clock. The rest are placed away. A little later the manager has occasion to ask for them. He discovers that one is missing and placing the biame upon the clerk, discharges him. He goes home in despair to his wife and cbild. It is difficnlt to secure work, and hills are coming in quickly.

As his little boy is walking down tbe street, a gnst of wind blows his hat off, and it rests on the spot where lies a pocket-book, containing a large amount of money. The young fellow brings the money to his father, who discovers that it belongs to his former employer. It is returned, and as the manager is writing the man's name on a piece of paper, a gust of wind blows it under the old clock, where he finds the missing bond. It is needless to say that both employee and manager are soon together agaiu.

HIS FIRST TRIP (Aug. 16).—William Moore, a merchant, sent his son, Lee, on a trip to sell some of his goods. After many weeks of hardship, Lee is despondent. His father, a hard headed business man, extends to him no sympathies. However, he sends him the name of Mr. Green, of Hampton, Pa., who is a prospective customer.

In the hotel, young Lee confides his plan to a fellow salesman, who, being quick-witted, takes Lee's pants out of his room, when he is asleep, and gives them to the hell-hoy, with instructions to have them pressed, and returned to Lee at 10 o'clock next morning.

The next morning, Lee is in a dilemma as to what to do, having no pants to wear. It now comes to him that he has been tricked hy his fellow salesman, Samuel Lowenthal.

Lee now telephones to Mr. Green, inviting him and his family to come to him as his guests. The offer is accepted. Lowenthal arrives at Green's residence, only to find that they have gone away. He goes hack immediately to the hotel, where he finds that Lee has secured the order.

TWO OFFICERS (Aug. 18).—Two officers were pals for all their lives, hut they knew that as soon as jealousy got a footing, there would he some trouhle, for they hoth loved the same lady. So they consented to cut the cards, and the one drawing the highest would get the girl they loved. Richard loses—hut ouly for a time. While he was riding out of the country to forget about the lady and everything else, his horse tripped, giving him a hard knock on the head.

At this psychological moment, the lady Richard and Henry were fighting for, happens to he riding past in her automobile. She tenderly picks the man up and takes care of him. Henry soon learned that he was not the winner of the prize after all, so he tore up the agreement he had made with Richard. It is needless to say tbat the young lady's name is now Mrs. Richard Gray.

THE MODERN DIANAS (Aug. 19).—There are six little society girls who are beloved hy six society boys and tbe leader of the girls is a young woman of considerable wealth and position also of an equal amount of determination and originiality. Being a little hored with the social world and seeking a way to spend the summer vacation, she lights upon a hrilliant plan which she proceeds to submit to the other girls. The plan is that they shall all take possession of a little island of her father's in the St. Lawrence River near the Canadian shore and leaving the boys and civilization far behind them, shall fish, hunt and live in the woods and as far as possible, follow the example of Diana and her maids. Naturally the six hoys and sweethearts do not agree but the plan is put into execution nevertheless.

The island is beautiful and tbe girls do have a pretty good time at first. Then in the city we see the lonely boys, and one of them discovers in a newspaper a little note which says that some remote tribe of Indians in Canada have partaken too freely of firewater and are on the rampage. This suggests a brilliant idea to his fertile imagination and it, like the girls' plan, is put into immediate execution. The newspaper clipping is sent to the girls and produces something which resembles a panic in their bearts. Although they have with them an Indian servant and squaw, sent hy the owner of the island, they are convinced that their lives are in peril and they proceed to build a stockade about their little camp.

Then we see the hoys leaving New York and landing on the shores of the island at night, dressed in outrageous Indian costumes, which they finish putting on after they land.

Through the glasses at a distance, the girls see this band of Indians grouped among the trees and rocks of the island, not far from their camp. Certain that their lives are in peril, they send their big Indian guard ont to parley with the enemies.

The hoys, when they meet him, take possssion of bim and telling him their plan, persuade him to join them and become apparently a prisoner. Thus it happens that the xent time the girls look through the glasses they see their faithful ally chained to a tree with the Indians dancing a wild war dance about him and apparently torturing him.

One of tbe girls wants to exhibit a flag of truce but is refused hy the little leader, and not until after several days when provisions grow low and tbe canned goods are all gone, will she consent to parley with the enemy.

Through the half-closed gate they make terms and finally the Indians are admitted. They form a circle around the girls' camp fire and, sitting down, discuss the situation in guttural tones. And then to the girls' horror ,they insist upon their smoking the pipe of peace, forcing it in turn upon each one of the little maidens. Of course it soon comes out who the Indians are and the girls would be very angry save for the fact that the hoys have provided themselves with strings of fresh fish and other good things. Consequently they are made welcome and all ends happily.

NESTOR.

ROPED AND TIED (Aug. 9).—Why father preferred Victor Jackson, just hecause he had money, to a fine chap like Ned Harvey, for his sister's future husband, Dick Lyons, was totally at a loss to understand. Money wasn't everything, and he didn't intend to have Millie made miserable for life, not if he could help it.

Accordingly when Ned, after proposing for the girl's hand, had heen literally kicked off of the place hy Daniel Lyons, Dick gallantly came to the fore by offering to act as messenger for the lovers. The hoy's first attempt, bowever, met with but sorry success; his father not only demanded the note from him, but, likewise, planned with Jackson to surprise Ned at his trysting place, and give him a sound heating. Fortunately, Dick had overheard their plans, so hy notifying his friend, who quickly secured Long Bill to take his place, the tahles were neatly turned, and both old man Lyons and Jackson were only too glad to reach home. But so enraged was the father at this outrage to his dignity, that he declared Millie should marry the man of his choice, on the following day. So determined to take no chances, he promptly locked the young lady in ber room. No sooner had bis footsteps died away, however, than Millie sat down and wrote a note; then, watching out of the window nntil Dick passed by, she cautiously attracted his attention, and hade him take the note to her sweetheart, witb all possible speed.

At first, Ned was at a loss which way to proceed, but as be gazed at the hrother, and noted their striking resemhlance, a plan quickly formed in his mind. In a few moments, Dick had galloped hack to the ranch, and on the tape which Millie had let down, ticd Ned's answer, telling her to throw out some of her clothes, a hat and veil, and leave the rest to him. Qiuckly the boy snatched them up, and hurried hack of the harn, where with the aid of sister's "Sunday hair," he was soon transformed into what Tenbrook declared was "some squah."

Quietly the three stole up to Millie's window, then, after Dick had mounted his horse, and a ladder had been placed conveniently near, Tenbrook was sent in to notify old man Lyons and his friend, Jackson, who had just arrived with tbe minister, that Millie was at that moment making her escape. Waiting until he beard the two men almost behind him, Dick dasbed out of the yard, and although the others quickly ran for their horses, it was some time before the truant was captured, and even then, his veil protected him from detection.

In the meanwhile, the ladder had been nsed to such good effect, that Parson Jenkins had already given Mr. and Mrs. Harvey his hlessing, and they had slipped into the next room to watch the fun, when Daniel Lyons, with his runaway "daughter," and her future husband arrived. Reading by the old minister's astonished face that all had gone well with his friend, Dick calmly lifted his veil; an amusing scene followed, in which Jackson angrily insisted that Lyons had been playing a joke on him, and hnt for Ned's timely interference, the father would certainly have received a good heating. Happily, the other's outburst of temper had brought the old man to his senses, so that when Millie informed him of her marriage, he not only gave the young people his blessing, but a suhstantial wedding present, as well.

MUTT AND JEFF AND THE GOLDSTEIN BURGLARS (Aug. 12).—Mutt, the elongated, Cyrano-nosed companion of chunky little Jeff, cannot leave well enough alone. This time he gets in more trouhle than even pessimistic Jeff could dream of, the latter of course is dragged along into the vortext of mischief with its incidental uproarions mix-ups.

Goldstein's pawnshop is visited hy two mysterious strangers, who cleverly vanish with a good assortment of watches, diamonds and miscellaneous jewelry. The police are called in to apprehend the burglars; hut nothing substantial is accomplished. The iuvestigation, however, brings out the fact that one of the "crooks" is tall and thin, while the other is exceedingly short and stont.

Goldstein is in despair; with him every second lost means a great deal—he's not thirsting for vengeance alone, vengeance being hut a secondary matter—he wants his property hack—time is therefore, precions to Goldstein. Accordingly, he offers a reward for the apprehenslon of the thieves—here's a fine chance to make some easy money, thinks always-on-the-joh Mutt. Why not get on the scent and earn an honest cent? Why not? echoes little Jeff.

Mutt and Jeff as detectives, are more than a scream. They get in all sorts of mishaps, but Fate is with them, and they always manage to get out nntil—well, until they get "pinched" as the mysterious Goldstein robbers. In a flash, fame and fortune dissipate like mist before the sun, and though the real culprits are finally caught and "get theirs," Mutt and Jeff firmly decide to leave sleuthing alone.

THE EDELWEISS (Aug. 21).—Livea are risked daily in pursuit of pleaaure, more often to acquire little thinga of insignificant value.

Louise loved rare flowers, particularly the much-valued Edelweiss, to secure which many lives had been risked and sacrificed.

She had heard and read of these rare flowers and, now that her family were in the vicinity of the mountains, was determined to have a large bouquet for her very own.

Her parents strenuously objected to an ascent of the mountain peak, but suggest aending Henry, the girl's fiance. But Henry is subject to fits of giddiness and refuses to go, until chided by Louise for his lack of bravery. Part way up the mountain, Henry luckily meets a guide returning from a similar quest and succeeds in purchasing a part of his flowers. Then he returns in triumph to Louise, who is greatly overjoyed. His pleasure is short-lived, however, for suddenly the guide appears and accuses Henry of giving him a spurious coin. Louise is much enraged and decides to make the journey herself, accompanied by the guide from whom Henry made his purchase.

The latter, heartily ashamed of himself, determines to redeem if possible his lost ground, and hurriedly takes another path towards the same goal. Fortunately Henry reaches there first and is able to surprise Louise when she arrives. She accepts his offering of Edelweiss and all is forgiven.

HOW THEY WORK IN CINEMA (Aug. 21).—Dissatisfied with the new director, all employees of a large motion picture enterprise decide to go on a strike. In spite of entreaties they leave the studio in a body, thinking to cripple the concern. But the ingenious director was prepared for every emergency, and by means of a wonderful electrical invention demonstrated his ability to stage an entire production without the aid of human assistance.

Automatically the stage is prepared for a scene while furniture fittings and decorations mysteriously take their proper places.

Mechanically perfect artists appear before the camera and enact the drama. In short the picture is finally made in time for release on the advertised date.

THANHOUSER.

BACK TO NATURE (Aug. 8).—After extracting the best that was in him in the course of twenty years' service, with them, the Peoples' Insurauce Company discharges Joe Jackson, a faithful bookkeeper. So at middle life, Joe finds the sum-total of a "city career" a nervous wife, a drooping infant and a grown-up son and daughter, whom the city has converted into shallow, idle, selfish creatures. His own gains are a bank account that wouldn't stand the strain of city rent-paying and city living, while he was hunting for a job, so Joe concluded to get—"back to nature." He bought a farm with his savings and transported himself there with his family, much against the wishes of two members thereof—the indolent son and daughter, of course. But farm life proved the best blessing that could have been wished on the pair. They finally jumped into it with a vim, and it rejuvenated them, making them self-respecting and self-supporting and winning the daughter a prosperous neighbor for a husband. And the country air gave the youngest child the good health that the city could not extend to it.

In his new world, the farmer found that he had many friends, and he gradually became a person of influence among his neighbors, who had a chance to observe his sterling qualities. Oddly enough, it happened that many of them were policyholders in the insurance company that had once employed Joe, and there was a fight for control. And the farmers, who believed that the corporaiton needed to be reformed, decided to pool their influence, and gave Joe their proxies. They had confidence in his knowledge and integrity, they knew he was not falling behind.

The contest between the two big "interests" was so close, that Joe, to his surprise and to that of others, found that he held the balance of power. And the president, who had thrown him out, was sure that the one-time clerk would now avenge himself.

But Joe proved he was mistaken. Of the two forces he preferred the old directors, and from his knowledge of the business, gained during his obscure work, he was able to impress the board with the necessity for reforms he advocated. They expressed a willingness to carry out his idea, and he left the control of the company where it was.

The directors were impressed with the ability of Joe. The president admitted, shamefacedly, that the man had formerly been an employee, but had been "let out." The president went to Joe's farm to offer him another job, at much higher pay.

The farmer left the decision to his family, and the vote was unanimously, "no." Each member of the household realized that he or she had gained morally and physically by going "back to nature," and the president returned to the city, wondering, but still envious of the happiness he saw in that obscure little upstate farm.

CUPID THE CONQUEROR (Aug. 11).—A young artist, in love with a society girl, finally induces her to consent to pose for him, in a picture which he believes will be his masterpiece. And his confidence is increased when he finds just the child he wants for Cupid, to be in the painting with his lady fair.

The picture is a success, but the painter's courtship does not progress so favorably. He musters up courage enough to propose to the girl, and is utterly cast down when she refuses to give him a decided answer, although she does not actually reject him.

He waits, hoping to hear from her, but without result. Looking at the nearly completed painting, he wishes that he could invoke the power of Cupid to aid him, and dozes off. Cupid does come to him—in his dreams.

But Cupid, like the artist, has a hard time of it. He finds that for once, his arrows are not potent, and not only is he scorned, but he is harshly treated. Altogether, it is a sad and mightily ruffled little Cupid who calls to tell of the failure of his mission.

But when Cupid is really determined, you cannot avoid him. And in this case Cupid was on the job. Failing as a gentle Knight of Love, he adopted the coarse methods of the up-to-date highwayman, and at the point of a revolver, compelled the maiden to stand and deliver her heart. Then he returned in triumph.

The artist woke to find it was all a dream. But sometimes dreams come true, and this one did, for the girl who surrendered to the "dream Cupid," gave her hand and fortune to the painter, who loved her.

NOBODY LOVES A FAT WOMAN (Aug. 15).—Jack Darcy finds that it is hard to make a living in a great city, no matter what certain rich men may say, and is naturally overjoyed to receive word that he has inherited $50,000, left by a great uncle, who has severely neglected him in life. There is only one unpleasant string attached to the gift. To win it, Jack must, within one year, wed the daughter of the uncle's friend, a womau he has never met.

But that condition does not seem ao terrible until Jack has met the lady fair. She has a kind face, but she looks like twins. Jack makes a great hit with her; she causes Jack an awful shock. He would have given up the task at once had it not been for the lawyer, who tells him he has a year to think it over, and not to be hasty. Also, one never can tell what a woman will look like in a year, and this lady fair may look better, as it is certain that any change will be an improvement. So Jack while not committing himself, decides to suspend judgment.

The daughter of the uncle's friend does the best she knows how to train down. She wants to be a slim athlete, and goes through torturing training, without result.

The lawyer, with an amiable desire to get Jack accustomed to the woman, invites both to a house party at his seaside home, and there Jack decides to stop being an heir. He sees a young girl who has all the grace that he admires in a woman. She is an excellent swimmer, too, and when in a race she easily defeats Jack and several other men, he realizes that even $50,000 is not much money under certain circumstances. And this belief is intensified when he sees the fat girl in a bathing suit, and nearly dies of exhaustion on trying to rescue her in deep water.

He goes to the lawyer, and firmly informs him that he does not want the money, it can go to charity or any other old thing. The lawyer questions him, and finds that his mind is made up. Then he produces a codicil to the uncle's will, to be in force only if the young man refuses to marry the girl. In that case, the uncle says, he admires the boy's manly spirit, applauds him for his refusal to accept dictation—and doubles the legacy.

All of which shows that sometimes it pays not to be mercenary, and that virtue is occasionally well paid. But as nobody loves a fat woman, the outcome of the matter did not exactly please the daughter of the friend of Jack's great uncle.

THE TRAIN DESPATCHER (Aug. 18).—The H. T. & D. Railroad engages a new general manager, who, while he has plenty of ability, also has some decided prejudices. One is that women have no business in the service of a railroad, and the first thing he does after being installed is to notify the women that their services are no longer required. One of the victims, because of her faithfulness and excellent service, has risen to the position of train despatcher, but she goes like the rest of her sex.

The girl lives in a little country town, and is the sole support of her crippled little brother. Losing her position so unjustly was a severe blow to her, but she bravely made the best of it, and hid her troubles from the child.

The boy was taken sick one night, and his sister, alone with him in the house, started out over the country road to get a doctor. On her way she crossed railroad track, and to her horror saw that there had been a washout. Knowing the train time as she did, she was aware that the night express would be along shortly and unless it was halted, there would be terrible loss of life.

The train was coming from the opposite side of the abyss, so she could not flag it. There was no station near, and no telephone that could be reached in time to prevent the catastrophe. But the girl was resourceful, climbed a telegraph pole, and with a makeshift apparatus called up division headquarters.

Even then her heroism would have been of no avail, had it not been for a lucky accident. The despatcher who took the girl's place, was fond of liquor, and on this night, was in a drunken slumber. He did not hear the call, and every moment increased the danger.

But the general manager happened to be in his office. He had seen his mother off on that train, and then returned to his desk to attend to some important business. He heard the insistent call in the next room, and being a railroad man, went in to investigate.

There he found the operator asleep at his post, and took the message himself. It came in time for him to hold the train, but he realized that he had saved the train's passengers and the mother he dearly loved only by a narrow margin. Also that the one person deserving of credit was the girl he had discharged, simply because she was a woman.

The manager made amends the best he could. He restored the girl to her old position at an increased salary, and as gratitude is often akin to love (and with more reason than pity) there is reason to believe that the despatcher lost her job again, but this time to take a life position in happy surroundings.

AMBROSIO.

THE QUEEN OF NINEVEH (Aug. 9).—The Queen of Nineveh plots with Prince Canaeh to destroy the King. Hidden behind a curtain they see the King drink poisoned wine. The High Priest takes the King's young son Aznra, and hides him, and fifteen years later brings him forth and presents him to the populace, which greets him with acclamation and moves on the palace to avenge the death of the King. Prince Canach cravenly hides when the Queen bids him lead the royal guard against the mob, and she dons his armor and takes his place at the head of the troops. A sensational battle takes place ,reaching its height on the steps of the palace. Azura singles out, as he thinks, Prince Canach and when his opponent falls mortally wounded he finds it was his own mother.

BISON.

GRAY CLOUD'S DEVOTION (Aug. 8).—The tribe moves on, leaving behind the parents of Alatoma, who are very sick. Alatoma stays with them, and Gray Cloud, her suitor, remains to assist her. A party of surveyors comes in the vicinity, including a handsome young doctor, and the latter cures the sick people. Alatoma falls in love with the doctor, but he gently stops her advances, showing her the photograph of his fiancee. Gray Cloud, who has been furiously jealous, admires the honorable conduct of the doctor, and gives him a bag of gold nuggets, taken from a secret mine of the Indians.

THE NEW COWBOY (Aug. 11).—Bob, the new cowboy, is smitten with Helen, the rancher's daughter, who looks with favor upon him. Bud pesters her with his attentions, although snubbed and rebuffed. He tries to force her to marry him, waylaying her on the road and leading her horse to the office of the justice of the peace despite her angry protestations. Willie, her little brother, riding on his pony, sees Bud intercept the girl and rides swiftly to the ranch and tells Bob. He plunges the spurs into his horse's flanks and gallops at break-neck speed to the scene, and disarming Bud administers a sound thrashing to the bully.

RELIANCE.

THE CITY (Aug. 9).—Reading in a newspaper an interview with the manager of a big corporation regarding the scarcity of competent employees, a young man goes to the city, leaving his wife and baby in the country till he shall have made a new home for them. He finds the newspaper article is an exaggeration, and his quest for work is fruitless. Overcome with the heat and worry, he is taken to the hospital and suffers the entire loss of his memory. He finally secures employment and in ten years rises to the position of general manager, living in affluence. His wife comes to the city to find him, but is unsuccessful She earns a meager living for herself and child by needlework, and when the boy reaches the age of eleven he determines to look for work. He secures a position as office boy in his father's office in spite of his youth, owing to the manly plea he makes. Entrusted with the bank deposit he loses the money, and is suspected of having stolen the money. The manager, however, has faith in him and accompanies him home with a policeman. There husband and wife meet, and the sight of her face restores his memory, and father, son and mother are quickly locked in a close embrace.

IMP.

A BOY'S BEST FRIEND (Aug. 14).—James Carrington, born in a country village, is a successful broker, at the zenith of his career as a speculator. He left his birthplace as a boy and has never returned so engrossed is he in the game of amassing wealth. He has neglected his parents in the hustle and bustle of the street and the story opens at a crucial time when his operations require all his time and attention in marshaling his forces in the big struggle to acquire a controlling interest in some stocks. There are scenes of activity in his office, where he is passing through the throes of a busy day, directing his army of assistants. He is tired and weary of it all, satiated with the excitement of outwitting his competitors.

He receives a letter from his old home announcing the illness of his mother. Mother—the name brings fond remembrances to his fagged brain. He has not seen her for years—longer than he cares to attempt to remember, and he reflects. He is brought back to the sordid things of the world by the announcement that his grand coup—his master stroke to amass a huge fortune—is about to be pulled off as the time is opportune. He receives the news in a matter of fact way, his mind reverting to his childhood days and—his mother.

He leaves the office, being reminded that the morrow will be the critical time—when he will crush his business enemies and be a power in the street, his name on every lip, as the clever financier who has succeeded.

He goes to his apartments, not interested in business, his thoughts constantly reverting to his youth. He will go, although sacrificing a fortune. He sends a telegram to his mother and quickly follows.

The story closes with the mother, ill in bed, anxiously awaiting the coming of her boy. He arrives and is clasped in her arms.

BEHIND THE TIMES (Aug. 17).—For many years Rev. David Ellis has been pastor of the congregation of a village church. He has been loved by his flock and has seen it grow from a small number to a flourishing pastorate. The aged preacher has not kept pace with the times and the fact is noted by the members of one of the women's societies. The president, a society woman, has her ideas and decides that the old teacher should be replaced by a younger minister. It is decided to retire the old pastor on a pension and install his successor.

Rev. Charles Montgomery arrives and the news is broken to Dominie Ellis at his home. The new minister is young, and a favorite with the women. His first sermon is listened to with interest and at the close he is congratulated. The old pastor is there and he wends his way out with his faithful wife.

Reverend Ellis has one stanch friend, a sweet young girl of the village, and her mother becomes ill. The daughter meets the Reverend Mr. Montgomery as he is about to go motoring and implores him to go to her home. He has no time for calling on his parishioners.

The girl goes to the old minister and tells him of the illness of her mother. Stopping to pluck a flower, he goes with her and sits by the bedside of the mother.

His coming is a surprise to the woman of fashion, but he takes matters in hand, kneels by the bedside of the child and prays—long and earnestly. His supplication is heard, the child revives, much stronger. The mother starts to thank him and he moves away.

The next Sunday the Reverend David Ellis occupies the pulpit and at the close of the sermon he is surrounded by the congregation and warmly congratulated.

AMERICAN.

THE BRAND OF FEAR (Aug. 17).—Jack Vernon, the sheriff of San Juan County, and his wife are happy when an escaped outlaw steals upon them and fires the fatal shot that plunges their home in gloom, leaving Mrs. Vernon a widow. Later the pre-natal influence has marked her newborn babe with the brand of fear, and he goes through life shunned as a coward, an object of derision to all his companions.

One day as the boys are tormenting Jack, Mildred Clayton, the daughter of the boy's employer, put in an appearance, and rescues Jack. She takes him home and introduces him to her parents. An unexpected visit is made by Manuel Vak, a Mexican half-breed, who is in love with Mildred. He flies into a rage when he sees Jack. He is ordered to leave by her father; but he swears vengeance. He returns with two of his cronies, and captures Mildred as she is going to the pump for water. Her screams bring her father, but he is knocked almost unconscious by one of the men.

Jack leaves the ranch house, and returns to the village, where the boys continue to humiliate him. They take the sheriff's badge from him, and place it upon Jack, proclaiming him the new sheriff. In the midst of their humiliation, Mildred's father staggers up, and relates to them what has happened.

In an instant, to the astonishment of the boys, Jack starts in pursuit of the Mexican. He finds him, gives him a good blow, and rescues Mildred.

CHAMPION.

THE THREE CALLS (Aug. 14).—When Paul White gave up his school of cadets and went to the front, it wounded the heart of his little sweetheart, Mabel Thompson.

Soon Paul was placed in charge of a signal corps. One day his sweetheart came with her father, a major, on a visit. During the visit, Paul explained some of the mysteries of heliographing or signaling mirrors, using her own little pocket mirror by way of demonstration. It was a pretty scene between teacher and pupil, and love was the lesson.

But one day, in the midst of success, a catastrophe worse than death overtook our hero. The explosion of a shell deprived him, not of life, but what we regard as more precious, the mind. No more did he lead his men in the resounding charge and din of battle, but utterly oblivious to all of his surroundings, his days went by until the war was over.

Through it all, and ever by his side, stood the loyal little girl. The doctor, an eminent specialist, had given up all hope for his recovery. Overcome by her emotion, she wept bitterly, and then recovering herself, she had recourse to her mirror, that she might view her face and remove the tears. But something startling occurred. The flash of the mirror in the sunlight caught the eye of the stricken youth, and like a beam of light, a ray of reason entered his mind.

The doctor had already said that only could some great or momentous occurrence restore that faded mind. Thus came a great hope to Mabel, for an idea struck her. It was simply this; to re-enact the scene, in which Paul had participated when the calamity befell him. This was done—the same spot was chosen—the men in arms again donned the gray. The mimic warfare was at its height—then suddenly the blessed reason was restored to him. They led him away and complete recovery rapidly followed. And the great happiness of knowing and enjoying the love of one of the best and truest of women was his once more.

HOW THE GIRLS GOT EVEN (Aug. 16)—Three young men plan to play a joke on their girl friends. The boys and girls were in the midst of a quiet evening, and the latter, unsuspecting. Suddenly a wild scream was emitted from a girl's lips, and she bounded on the back of an arm chair. Instantly, the cause of her dire apprehension had become known, and the other two girls followed her example. The cause of all was a very wee mouse; which was a mechanical toy, pulled across the floor by one of the boys.

The next day, each young man received a challenge, daring him to go to a certain haunted house. The girls, meanwhile had preceded them, and gathered together some ancient ghost paraphernalia. Soon the three boys came along, armed to the teeth. Just as they are settled down to a nice game of "seven-up," "hang," one of them gets it on the side of the head. He leaped to his feet with drawn gun, but nowhere can he see where the blow came from, for the door behind him was locked. This got the brave fellows' nerve, and when huge chairs rattled, and tree stumps thumped about, they vigorously attacked their bottle of "courage."

The climax was reached when white robed figures appeared. With wild yells they clung to each other; fired their guns, and performed every stunt that brave men are not supposed to, and they finally collapsed with exhaustion. In the next room, the girls were hysterical with laughter.

REX.

THE WHITE RED MAN (Aug. 10).—Steve Jennings holds up a coach and escapes into the woods with booty. He had been wounded in the fray, however, and through weakness, drops part of the jewelry he had stolen. A little later an Indian passing along, sees the baubles and picks them up. In making his way through the forest he steps into the bear-trap of Gene Thomas, a trapper, who lives with his wife and child in a near-by hut. The Indian extricates his foot from the trap at last, and drags his way to the hut, where Mrs. Thomas dresses the wound and treats the injured Indian. The latter, grateful for the hospitality, gives Mrs. Thomas the jewels he has found. In the meantime, a posse has been seeking the bandit and an undersheriff comes to the Thomas hut, exhausted and spent from the fruitless pursuit, to ask for a drink of water. While the child goes for it, he notices the jewelry on the table, and is at once convinced that Thomas is the outlaw. In spite of Mrs. Thomas' protestations that the jewels were given to her by a grateful Indian for kindness shown him, the trapper is taken into custody in a jail several miles from the place. In a barroom in town that night, the Indian hears of the arrest of Thomas and the crime with which he is charged. At once he tells the crowd that he was the one who gave Mrs. Thomas the jewels and that Thomas is innocent. He begs the men to lend him a horse so that he can ride to the jail and prove they have condemned the wrong man, but the men only jeer at him and laugh at his story. At last, driven to desperation, the Indian determines to cover the distance to the jail by foot, in spite of his injured leg. Over the mountains he speeds, running, jumping, dragging himself along, swimming a brook, braving hardships and overcoming obstacles with the stoic fortitude which only an Indian could evidence, until he reaches the jail and corroborates the story told by Mrs. Thomas. The Sheriff is so impressed with the evident seriousness of the Indian that he orders a further search made, and soon they find the body of the real outlaw in a copse nearby, with the rest of the plunder on his person, dead from weakness and loss of blood—human evidence of Thomas' innocence. Thomas is at once liberated, and the grateful Indian who, to repay a kindness, went through such suffering and physical strain in his turn earns the gratitude of the white man.

YANKEE.

A GOOD NATURED MAN (Aug. 14).—The mishaps begin as the hero of this story leaves his home with a broad grin upon his good natured face. Mingling with a lot of schoolboys, who are playing football, he becomes the butt of their overflowing spirits and is buffeted about as though he were a football. Passing a partly finished building, he is just in time to receive a load of brick upon his head, which a careless laborer has permitted to slip from his shoulders. Passing along the highway, he is run into by a huckster with a cartload of over-ripe bananas and falls into the cart; smiling in his good natured way, upon a handsome young woman, he receives a thrashing at the hands of her escort, who mistakes him for a flirt. While enjoying the river breezes from a pavilion on the water front, he is thrown into the water by a boisterous rowdy. While seated upon the railing of a landing dock he is again thrown into the river and when pulled from the water is given up by his rescuers for dead. They place him upon a stretcher and carry him to his home. As his wife falls prostrated upon his body, to the surprise of all, he rises to a sitting posture and his good natured grin puts all into good humor again.

A CHILDREN'S PARADISE (Aug. 14).—In our picture of the "Children's Paradise," a splendid opportunity is given to see the life these "babies of the poor" lead daily in one of the largest fresh-air homes in the world. Mt. Lawn is situated at Nyack, on the Hudson, N. Y., and was founded by Dr. Louis Klopsch, in 1895. The home occupies 35 acres of beautiful woodland and is indeed a veritable paradise for the little ones who never see a blade of grass grow or can fill their little lungs with God's fresh air. Three thousand starved babies are made happy and healthy by a two-weeks' vacation, when they receive plenty to eat and can breathe God's pure air. The home is supported by voluntary contributions and costs to maintain, $20,000.00 per year.

HER FATHER'S SECRETARY (Aug. 18).—Dick Blair, the idle son of millionaire parents being born with a "silver spoon in his mouth" like many another of the "idle rich," abuses his opportunities and becomes in early manhood, a dissipated man about town. In spite of repeated warnings and also threats of disinheritance, he continues in the "pace that kills" until his father, realizing that unless the boy is thrown upon his own resources and made to feel actual want, he would go to an early grave, finally drives him from the home that had sheltered him since childhood, and orders him to make his own way in the world.

His new life begins when he saves from drowning the daughter of a famous banker and modestly disappears after the heroic deed. In answering an application for a private secretary, he finds his employer to be the father of the girl whom he had saved from drowning. The daughter of the banker recognizes Dick as her rescuer and the banker takes a special interest in him. Dick's sterling qualities eventually win him a junior partnership with his employer and also the hand of the girl whom he rescued from a watery grave. Proud of his wife and the position in life he has attained, he calls upon his father and a happy reconciliation follows.

available utensils. His success as a milkman is remarkable, and the whole room is soon inundated with the white fluid, which he then proceeds to churn into butter. His zeal in this respect, however, is not tempered with wisdom, and he works so lustily that he knocks a hole through the bedroom floor and is precipitated, milk, butter, and all, into the arms of a lady in the apartment beneath. But Bill is never disheartened, and we leave him still blissfully happy, nursing the great slab of butter in which his efforts have resulted.

THE CRIPPLE (Aug. 11).—A cripple girl, employed in an office, becomes more than ever painfully conscious of her affliction when lunch time comes round and she cannot join the others in their hour of merriment. A young clerk, however, has noticed her sadness, and stays to talk to her, as a result of which he is led to declare that he loves her. The other clerks return, and surprise the love scene, which amuses them intensely. Presently they discover a letter, which the cripple girl's lover has left on his desk, written by his sister, and telling him to meet her at a certain hour that evening. They see the means herein for a practical joke, and accordingly write an anonymous note to the cripple, telling her that the man she loves is only flirting with her, and that if she wants proof, she is to follow him that night and witness his infidelity. The ill-natured plot succeeds in so far that the cripple girl is made miserable, and is led to confront her lover with angry recriminations when he kisses his sister. But all is satisfactorily cleared up, and the laughter is eventually turned upon those who so maliciously endeavored to ruin the happiness of the cripple.

GREAT NORTHERN.

THE MOTHER'S MARK (Aug. 12).—A newly married wife is in great grief at the death of her only child. One day she and her husband call at a cottage for refreshment during a walk and there see a child whose features bring back to the mother's recollection the child she has lost. The peasant woman is persuaded to allow the visitors to adopt the child, first making a tattoo mark on its arm. Twenty years elapse, the peasant woman dies, and one of her daughters by chance gets a situation in the house where her adopted brother is living with his foster parents. There has been staying in the cottage home another brother, who is the scapegrace of the family. He enters the house where his sister is employed for burglarious purposes. His brother whom he does not know has just come in and grapples with the intruder. The burglar is just about to shoot when he sees the mark of the other man's arm, and knows that they must be brothers. Gratitude that he has been saved from committing fratricide overcomes him, and the brothers embrace, after which there is a general reconciliation.

TEDDY TRAINED BL HIS MOTHER (Aug. 12).—This is an unusual film, showing the antics of a baby bear born in captivity. The care of the she-bear for her offspring is remarkable. The sagacious creature teaches the youngster to swim by entering the water herself and encouraging the cub to come in too. Similarly by example, she teaches the cub various other "stunts."

SOLAX.

HIS WIFE'S INSURANCE (Aug. 9).—Poor old Higgins, who has been noticing the sylph-like forms of other women, is much distressed at the goodly proportions of his own worthy spouse. He decides to remedy matters and his friend procures for him a bottle of Dr. Thin's Anti-Fat, which can be easily administered by putting a few drops into his wife's coffee. Coincident with this Higgins determines to renew his wife's life insurance. Hurrying from the house for this purpose, he accidentally drops from his pocket a note which had accompanied the bottle of Anti-Fat, and which is found by a policeman who senses a possible crime. He trails Higgins to the insurance office, notes the renewal of the insurance and then follows him home, where he sees Higgins putting the poison (?) in his wife's coffee. He is arrested, but is able to prove his innocence and the treatment of Anti-Fat is forthwith discontinued.

A BUM AND A BOMB (Aug. 9).—The interest recently aroused by the Cammorist's trial in Italy, forms the chief topic of conversation around McGinniss' saloon. The impressionable Irishman has been greatly interested in the detailed description in the newspapers of the horrible crimes perpetrated by the Black Hand ,and his mental condition easily lends itself to the doings of two frolicsome friends, who, disguised in villainous looking whiskers, call upon McGinniss and present him with a note to the effect that his saloon will be blown up by a bomb. Coincident with this some boys playing football lose their ball, which is found by the bum. He conceives the idea of trading the ball for a drink, and strange to say, calls at McGinniss' saloon, and presenting the ball to the astonished McGinniss, demands a drink. McGinniss, horrified, and thinking at last the threat is about to be fulfilled, places before the astonished bum all sorts of good things, and meanwhile he and his friends beat a hasty retreat, leaving the bum cock of the walk.

AN ENLISTED MAN'S HONOR (Aug. 11).—Dora, daughter of Col. Case, while out walking one day, is insulted by a half-bred Mexican, and rescued by Jack Mann, a soldier of the 15th Cavalry. They fall in love with each other, and Jack studies for a commission, while Dora goes abroad. When she returns Jack has become a sergeant.

One day the troop goes on detached service and Jack is detailed as Post Exchange. The renegade Mexican discovers that Jack has the money in his possession and plans to rob him. The nefarious plot is successful and the renegades escape to their stronghold with the loot. Jack's tale is doubted and he is placed under arrest, but succeeds in escaping and riding after his troop which arrives just in time to capture the renegade. They return to the post and everything is straightened out and the young people receive the parental blessing.

POWERS.

CHEYENNE DAYS (Aug. 8).—A real wild and woolly West with desperate riding, bucking broncbos, unexcelled lariat work by Art Boden, the champion lasso king of Wyoming, and rough riding by the famed Otto Kline, the champion broncho buster of the West. Among other features a vicious outlaw bucking horse is mastered. The famous headliner of Percy Williams Orpheum attraction is reproduced. A miniature Wild West Show is seen and the general prairie atmosphere is rigidly adhered to.

A HARMLESS FLIRTATION (Aug. 8).—A young wife invests in a necklace which she is afraid to show to her husband because he may accuse her of extravagance. She has occasion to pawn it and loses the ticket, which is found by her husband, who redeems it and not knowing of his wife's claims to it, presents it to a young lady. The wife sees it on this girl's neck, demands an explanation and hubby is in for a hot time. Everything is satisfactorily explained and the clouds are cleared away.

LONE EAGLE'S TRUST (Aug. 12).—During a war between Indian tribes, Lone Eagle is seriously wounded and left for dead. He is discovered by a ranchman, who takes him home, and convalescent, won by the kindness, he begs to remain on the ranch, promising to make himself useful. He proves his adaptability by becoming the most useful of punchers. Eagle constitutes himself guardian over the daughter. One day while riding along the summit of a precipice, she is thrown to the bottom. The family are frantic over the absence of their daughter. All search the prairie. Lone Eagle, striking a trail which belongs to the lost girl's horse. As he hurries along he is seen by his tribal enemy, who stealthily follows him. Eagle sees her suspended thirty feet from the top and with a rock strewn yawning canyon beneath. A brief instant and the Indian has arranged his lariat around a tree, and climbing down is at her side. He slowly hoists her. As she nears the top Lone Eagle's enemy is there. Realizing an opportunity for a double vengeance, he is about to cut the lariat, thus hoping to hurl the girl to the sharp rocks. A shot is heard and the treacherous chief writhes in agony. The father had fired the shot. The chief, realizing his end is near, shoots Lone Eagle. The lariat slackens in Lone Eagle's failing grasp and the girl descends toward the rocks, but he maintains the girl suspended in the air until her father saves her. The chief rolls down the cliff and Lone Eagle is restored to his friends as a hero.

BABES IN THE WOODS (Aug. 15).—The children's father dies, leaving his estate to his hypocritical brother, in case the two little ones die. This is an opportunity for the wicked uncle and he hopes the children may die. They thrive daily and he, annoyed by creditors and impending obligations, is at his wit's end. One day he thinks of a swashbuckling free lance named Walter, and believes he sees in him a man fit for any desperate deed, so he sends for Walter and another ruffian, and employs them to kill the children. Waiter, who is good at heart, would have refused to aid him, but in sympathy for the little ones, he pretends to obey the uncle. In fact, his motive is to get the babes away from the unprincipled relative. So the two ruffians journey forth with the unsuspecting innocents. A dark wood is reached and the other ruffian suggests that it is a proper place for the foul deed. Of course good Walter objects, and instantly swords are out and a duel commences. Walter triumphs and astounds the uncle by appearing before him with the unharmed children. The unexpected sight causes him to swoon and he is borne to bed, where he is terrified by visions of his dead brother. The shock kills him and the children assume charge of the castle where Walter lives as a second father.

THE SQUAW'S DEVOTION (Aug. 19).—A young trapper saves an Indian girl from drowning. She does not forget and recognizing him in after years, tells him of her gratitude. He teaches her to read and write. She is loved by Sly Fox, a half breed who, learning of this friendship, becomes jealous and forges a note to him from the girl saying she has been injured and he is to go to her at the cave of the winds. The trapper obeys and falls into an Indian trap, from which he is rescued amid the blazing brush by the girl. The Indians pursue, and after a long and exciting canoe chase overtake them. Sly Fox fires and the girl is accidentally wounded. This turns the trapper into a demon, and he leaps from his canoe into the water, and, swimming to that of the pursuer's he overturns it and gives battle to both the Indians in the water. He defeats them, regains his canoe and brings her ashore to regain her health and happiness.

ODE TO THE PICTURE FILM.

Oh, Moving Picture film, to thee I sing an ode
And incidentally rise and beg to say:
Your comedy is fairly good, your drama à la mode,
But please remove, without delay,
Your Indian, cowboy and wild West play!

Oh, Moving Picture film, I like to gaze at you,
You cheer me on a dull and rainy day.
The love scenes make a hit with me, indeed they really do,
But won't you kindly take away
Your Indian, cowboy and wild West play?

Oh, Moving Picture film, I hope you'll tarry long,
I don't know what I'd do should you not stay,
Your heroines are charming, your heroes handsome, strong,
But goodness knows we could do away
With your Indian, cowboy and wild West play!

Oh, Moving Picture film, don't leave us for a while,
Promise to forever keep us gay,
Your comic scenes have surely made all kinds of people smile,
But oh! oh! do throw away
Your Indian, cowboy and wild West play!

Dear Sirs:
Machine came back in good shape, and I want to thank you for getting it back to me so quick. The machine is in perfect shape and projects a much brighter and clearer picture than it ever did. I am a machinist myself by trade and I can tell good work when I see it. The machine runs 50% easier than it did and is very quiet. It is worth a great deal more than I paid to have the machine run as it does. The Star and cam are certainly all you claim for them and I can readily see why they will outwear any ordinary star and cam.

Yours truly,

Dear Sir:
Yours of May 31, saying you have had another inquiry about deal with Mr. Stevens at hand. In regard to your cam will say it does not interfere with gate at all, no matter where the machine is framed, and it works smooth and almost noiseless, and the picture it puts on the screen is a joy to see, clear, steady, and as a visiting picture show owner said a few nights ago, "It is the best picture I ever saw in my life anywhere." And that is about what we think too. Have seen pictures in some of the finest houses in this country but I have yet to see one that will beat ours since you put your repairs on our machine.
Those sprockets repaired are fine. I have recommended you to several since securing machine. Also showed sample sprocket and explained saving on having sprockets repaired.
Wishing you every success,
I am respectfully yours,

a new trait in the American Indian—and puts the discovery in a picture that's a treat.

"A White Redman"

Released Thursday, August 10th

IS a new one on you for local color, isn't it? It's a film with an Indian who has an original personality, and teaches us a lesson of sacrifice and stoic fortitude that should be long remembered. It tells a sound and subtle tale of an Indian's loyalty and gratitude. An intensely human story, original and stimulating. Talk about "talking pictures"! This one is eloquent! The characters are worked in upon the brain with such exactness, perfection and realism that you will almost think you hear their voices.

This is not leap year, but the 80 foot leap the Indian makes at one part of the story is a thriller!

"A WHITE REDMAN"

IT'S REALLY FUNNY

To Watch the Tactics Resorted to by the Patents Company Endeavoring to Check the Very Large Falling Off of Their Business and its Efforts to Regain Part of it by Bringing Suits Against Independent exhibitors upon the Latham Loop Patent No. 707934 and the Pross Patent No. 722382 (for the Pross Revolving Shutters), thus trying to scare and intimidate EXHIBITORS INTO signing long term contracts with it to use only Trust films.

THERE IN NOTHING IN THESE SUITS that need alarm any exhibitor. The Trust gains no legal advantage whatever from beginning these numerous suits or from prosecuting them. There is already a suit pending on the Latham Loop Patent, in which testimony is being taken and which suit we are defending. We have every reason to expect a decision in our favor in this suit and that will conclusively settle all of the suits now brought or being brought.

KEEP YOUR DRUM HEADS DRY

The very nature of drum heads causes them to absorb moisture readily, and when the heads become damp it is an absolute certainty that your drum will lose its brilliancy.

Our latest invention, the Electric Drum Heater, entirely overcomes this difficulty, for by its use you can keep your drum brilliant and snappy regardless of the weather.

This device can be attached to any drum and the connecting plug will fit any ordinary 110-volt incandescent lamp socket. It gives no light; never burns out; may be turned on and off at will, or if desired, entirely removed in a few seconds time. Entire outfit, including the Heater proper, two connecting plugs, and six feet of cord, weighs eight ounces—the Heater but two. It is practically indestructible and can easily be carried in your drum case.

Be sure and say whether you wish it for Snare Drum, Bass Drum, or Tympani, as each instrument requires a different strength.

Try one—your money back if you are not entirely satisfied

"THE WINDS OF FATE"

CAST.

John Armstrong.....Charles Ogle
James Norton.....Sydney Booth
His wife.....Miriam Nesbitt
Their son.....Gladys Hulette

A dramatic story in which the wind, by blowing certain papers, sets the various happenings in motion. It causes a man to be wrongfully suspected of crime, and finally rights the wrong.

SCENE FROM "TWO OFFICERS"

Wednesday, August 16th

"HIS FIRST TRIP"

CAST.

W. P. Moore.....Robert Brower
Lee Moore.....Edward Boulden
Samuel Dowenthal.....Charles M. Seay
Silas Green.....John R. Cumpson
Mrs. Green.....Nellie Filmore

How a young salesman made good and secured a large order in the face of decidedly unfair competition. Lots of fun with plenty of human nature.

Saturday, August 19th

"THE MODERN DIANAS"

CAST.

Diana.....Mary Fuller
Her best young man.....Harold M. Shaw
An Indian servant.....Charles Ogle
His wife.....Louise Sydmeth

A party of young girls camping on an island, think they are attacked by a party of Indians, who turn out to be their best young men. Full of the spirit of youth, and played in beautiful scenery.

SCENE FROM "HIS FIRST TRIP"

Friday, August 18th

"TWO OFFICERS"

CAST.

Helen.....Mary Fuller
Two cavalry officers.....(Marc McDermott .....(Sydney Booth

This is a story built around a volunteer cavalry organization, and shows the cavalry manœuvres. It is a good dramatic story and spectacular production.

Bill Wishes to Make Butter. [COMEDY—458 FEET

The Cripple DRAMA—462 FEET

An excellent split reel combining a comedy and a drama. In the comedy "BILL" gets into some most unusual and extraordinary situations at which your audience will be convulsed. The drama portrays a little love story with the usual bit of jealousy and an unusual touch of pathos.

Correspondence solicited from first-class houses only, as the prices of these features will be prohibitive for the smaller exhibitor.

"It's No Gamble When You Draw IMPS"

(Illustration suggested by Ernest Chester, Kane, Pa.)

You don't have to bluff to get a full house when you draw Imps. You've got a dead sure thing. Even the children know that they'll enjoy the show when you advertise "Imp To-day." And down in your heart you know, know, know that Imps are in a class by themselves. That being the case, why don't you see that you get two Imps every week? For instance, here's a pair of Imps that you ought to get if you have to fight for them:

"A BOY'S BEST FRIEND"

Read the synopsis of this film elsewhere in this issue and then imagine what a powerful picture is possible with Imp acting, Imp staging, Imp expertness back of it. This release will appeal to everybody! Ready August 14th. (Copyright, 1911, I. M. P. Co.)

"BEHIND THE TIMES"

This is another Imp melodrama of the highest type. No one can pick a flaw in it. It teaches a lesson, tells a heart story and leaves a good taste in the mouth. Go after it with all your might! Begin to-day! Ready August 17th. (Copyright, 1911, I. M. P. Co.)

WARNING TO DUPERS

Every Imp film is now copyrighted and any duping or infringing will be prosecuted immediately and vigorously. This is fair warning. Hands off!

MAKE 'EM YOURSELF SLIDES

Make them yourself. Written with pen and ink or typewriter. Three minutes to make a slide. Used for advertising slides, to announce future or feature programmes, for chorus slides when chorus slide is missing. We send four colors of gelatin. The slides look well and any one can make them. They are handy also for announcing vaudeville acts. In fact they may be readily used for anything you may wish to say to your audience.

For the sum of three dollars ($3) cash with order, we will send by express, charges not prepaid, the following:

24 cover glass, 1 package binder strips, 1 dozen mats, 1 instruction sheet, 1 form sheet and 50 strips assorted colors gelatin—enough for from 300 to 400 slides. Order now. Address

My Picture is 100% Steadier

Read what E. M. Hammond, operator of the Porterville, California, Opera House says about Kimble M. P. Machine Motors.

"Porterville, Calif.,
July 7, 1911.

Kimble Electric Co.,
1118 Washington Boul.,
Chicago, Ill.

Gentlemen:

Enclosed find a photo showing how I have my Kimble connected up to a 'Powers No. 5.' I have it bolted direct to the fly wheel with a flat belt twisted once, and an idler in between to take up slack when it is necessary to frame up or down.

I always look for your ads in the M. P. World, and I think if more managers would heed what you say, especially in the July 8th issue, and install a Kimble to run their machines, they would be surprised at the results.

My picture is 100% steadier and safer since I put in the motor; therefore, you see I would not be without it.

I purchased the motor of you through Mr. J. H. Hallberg, of New York City, about three months ago, and it has never had to have any repairs or attention up to date."

The steadiest hand at the crank cannot produce half as steady or even a picture as the KIMBLE M. P. Machine Motor makes, and when you drive with a motor, both the operator's hands are left free to do "stunts" that will surprise the audience and mystify competitors.

The Kimble M. P. Machine Motor is the only variable speed alternating current motor on the market. It varies, not by steps, but imperceptibly from 300 to 3,000 R. P. M. and permits delicate shadings under the operator's absolute control.

Hitch it to the light socket. It uses less current than a 16 c. p. light.

Since placing our system for displaying programmes before the exhibitors of motion pictures, we have been more than surprised the way orders have been coming in from live exhibitors all over the country asking that we furnish them with our system at once, as they desire to be the first to put on this high class advertising in their locality.

THERE-IS-A-REASON

for this, as good live wires know that by introducing a class of advertising of so high a character that he is bound to get the business away from his competitor who is still plodding along in the same old fashioned way of using unsightly posters and smearing the front of his theatre all over with paste.

A THEME THAT'LL MAKE YOU THINK is a story of the higher type that gives refinement and tone to your programme. It deals with the vengeance that was sought by a sea captain whose intemperance caused the loss of his ship and of the lives of his crew—except his mate. On the mate's testimony, the captain is given a prison sentence. At the expiration of his term, he seeks to "square" himself with the mate. But here nis Maker steps in, through an earthly delegate, and reminds him that he has another, a better, world to strive to attain. No. 239. Code word, Cross.

A New Thing in Love Stories

became possible through a—romance! A certain young author wished to write one, and found he couldn't concentrate on it in the busy city—and his publishers were anxious that he turn it out quickly. So to get far away from the civilization that hampered him, he set up house on an unsettled island. And to this island came—The Girl! How she got there, what she did there (mostly to the heart of the young author), and how wedding bells pealed forth when she went from there, are part of the romance that—the author didn't write! So we filmed it for you! No. 240. Code word, Roland.

THE SORROWFUL EXAMPLE

When the Innocent Must Suffer With the Guilty

Approximate length 999 feet.

The little family of husband, wife and infant child are just existing, the wife toiling to make ends meet, while the husband is a worthless scamp. The wife manages to set aside a little of her meager earnings to save for the child's future, which is her sole thought. The husband has tried to get this money, but the wife guards it carefully. He has become infatuated with a little Italian girl, who, not knowing him to be married, accepts his attentions. They plan to elope, and he finally manages to steal his wife's savings, with which he intends to leave for another town. They miss the train, however, and start back to the village to await the next one. On the way back he finds his wife's blood-stained apron. This is indeed a shock. The wife has missed the money, and following in pursuit, falls over a cliff on to the rocks below, receiving injuries that prove fatal, she having just strength enough left to crawl back and fall dead at the baby's crib, where the husband finds her. He is also repulsed by the girl when she learns the horrible truth.

RELEASED AUGUST 17th, 1911

THE BLIND PRINCESS AND THE POET

A Biograph Fantasy in the Land of Flowers

The Blind Princess upon consulting the soothsayer is told that upon the first kiss of unselfish love she receives she will see. All the great lords assemble to pay her court and bestow kisses in hopes of restoring her sight. There are Lords Gold, Selfish, Folly, Presumption and their ilk, but their attentions are in vain. A poor Poet has humbly loved the Princess, but considers himself unworthy until the Child Equality argues differently. Lord Gold in rage kills the Child Equality and the Poet loses hope. However, when the Princess sleeps the poor Poet steals a kiss. The Princess sees, and through the Poet's kiss. Lord Selfish would kill the Poet, but he is thwarted by Justice, as the Poet goes singing to his apparent death. Justice takes him to the Princess' side.

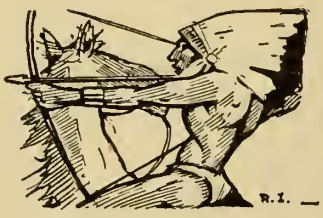
VITAGRAPH

"For Love and Glory" — Monday, August 14

An obdurate father renounces his son, who dies in battle in South Africa; refuses to help his son's wife. He is finally conquered by his son's child. The battle scenes are the real thing; the acting powerful.

"Captain Barnacle's Baby" — Tuesday, August 15

Disappointed, dejected, disgusted, life loses its charm to the Captain until he rescues a baby from a wreck at sea in the midst of a terrific storm. The little one brightens his whole life, the clouds clear away, and everything is sunshine and happiness.



"Man to Man"

Wednesday, August 16

Attacked by Indians on the Western border, the sheriff and prisoner fight the common foe side by side, proving a common brotherhood in common danger--the raging flood, and other perils that beset them, winning each other's respect.

"The Vitagraph Monthly" — Friday, August 18

An animated newspaper of current events. A head-on collision between two locomotives. National Athletic Association games, Marathon races, Taft at the LaCrosse games, and everything else worth seeing.

"A Second Honeymoon" — Saturday, August 19

They get married, quarrel, make up and get married again. We are twice pleased with this picture. It has a double equipment of laughs.

TESTIMONIALS

ORPHEUM THEATER

Chicago, Ill., Oct. 10, 1910.

Mr. A. W. Wylie, President,
Sunlight Metallic Cloth Curtain Co.,
1100 Fisher Building, Chicago.

Dear Sir:

The Sunlight Metallic Cloth Picture Screen that we purchased of you and installed at our Orpheum Theater, 176 State St., Chicago, has proved satisfactory in every way, and we have decided to purchase and install your screen in all of our other houses where we now have inferior curtains. Will be pleased to have you forward your usual contracts covering the list of theaters enclosed.

Your curtain has stood the test of four months' daily use at our Orpheum Theater, and we consider it has demonstrated conclusively to us every merit that you claimed for it, and it has not only improved our picture 50 per cent., but brings out the detail of the picture to an extraordinary degree. Gives it a bright, soft effect, not tiring to the eye, and is particularly fine for our tinted films, as it reproduces the colors perfectly and intensifies them.

We have found that it was necessary to use but from 30 to 35 amperes of electricity on our machines, and has therefore reduced our cost of operation relatively, as we formerly used from 45 to 50 amperes on our old screen. Yours truly,

JONES, LINICK & SCHAEFER CO.,
Sam'l I. Levin, Gen. Mgr.

ELECTRIC THEATER

Chicago, June 26th, 1911.

"Sunlight" Metallic Cloth Curtain Company,
1100 Fisher Building, Chicago.

Gentlemen:

When your man installed the "Sunlight" curtain some two weeks ago he requested that at my convenience I would let you know the results obtained; whether satisfactory or unsatisfactory.

I wish to say that while I considered I was showing one of the best pictures in town upon the screen I had in use, I know that the picture which I get upon the screen you sold me is far superior in every way.

The picture is soft but very clear-cut and shows the distance or perspective in a remarkable degree. I believe that without question I am showing the best picture in Chicago.

I pay a high price for my film service, but never received the full benefit before, although my projection is and has always been without fault.

I am glad to make the above statement, as having had a remarkably good curtain before, I was in doubt as to whether any appreciable improvement would be shown by installing your curtain.

Yours very truly,
GEORGE FRIEDMAN.

MAJESTIC THEATER

Butte, Montana, April 25, 1911.

The Sunlight Metallic Cloth Curtain Co.,
1100 Fisher Building, Chicago.

Gentlemen:

Enclosed find check for $140.50, covering charges on one 11 ft. by 14 ft. "Sunlight" fixed screen and one "Standard" frame with fittings.

I wish to compliment you on the excellency of the picture thrown on this screen, as it surpasses anything I have seen so far in the curtain line, both in brilliancy and absence of eye-strain. The feature which particularly appeals to me is, that while the pictures on the screen are decidedly brilliant, the strain and tiring of the eyes so prevalent in brilliant curtains is practically absent from this one. Very truly yours,

W. J. SWARTS.

CASINO THEATER

Chas. Wegham,
103 E. Madison St.,
Chicago, February 24, 1911.

Sunlight Metallic Cloth Curtain Co.,
1101 Fisher Building, Chicago.

Gentlemen:

We enclose you herewith our check for $193.00, payment in full for your invoice for Sunlight Metallic Cloth Curtain, less 5 per cent. cash discount.

We secure a truly wonderful improvement in our picture. Can keep our house well lighted without apparently affecting it, and this is very pleasing to our patrons.

The picture that we get on your curtain is soft in general effect, very clear in detail, and our patrons offer no objection to taking out front rows of seats.

Before we bought your curtain we had purchased the best and highest priced machines and paid for first run of films, but got only half the value of them because we did not have the proper screen. We think now, for the first time, we are getting the picture that is on the film. Yours very truly,

CASINO THEATER,
Per J. E. Horn, Mgr.

GEM THEATER

Union City, Tennessee.

Sunlight Metallic Cloth Curtain Co.,
Chicago, Ill.

Gentlemen:

I have the curtain installed, and it is the finest curtain I have ever seen. I get a fine white light and can do so with less current than I have been using. I have had to use 60 amperes alternating current, and now, almost all the time, unless the picture is very dark, I can get the best results at 30 amperes.

We got it up in good shape, and there is not a wrinkle in it. I cannot recommend it too highly.

Thanking you for favors, and with best wishes,
Yours truly,
W. C. MORRIS.

ORION THEATER

Butte, Montana, April 25, 1911.

Mr. E. SACHS,
Rep. Sunlight Metallic Cloth Curtain Co.,
Butte, Montana.

Dear Mr. Sachs:

I wish to notify you of my acceptance of the new Sunlight Metallic Screen which you installed at the Orion Theater. The pictures thrown on this screen are the most satisfactory of any I have seen, and there is no reflected glare or eye-strain.

I have endeavored for some time to secure a screen of the highest brilliancy without the accompanying eye-strain, and have found these qualities only in the Sunlight Metallic Screen.

Yours very truly,
SULLIVAN & CONSIDINE.

Facts and Comments

THE cornerstone of a great superstructure, which we hope will redound to the credit of the motion picture industry, was laid at Cleveland, Ohio, on August 1-2-3. The ceremonies were presided over by Mr. M. A. Neff, a prominent exhibitor of Cincinnati and Columbus and president of the Exhibitors' League of Ohio. The Ohio league has been in existence for some time, and while the good that they have accomplished for themselves has encouraged other States to organize, it was felt that a National League was necessary to cement the whole and give strength and dignity to the movement. It is unnecessary to remind the reader of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD that this paper was the first to promote the spirit of organization among the exhibitors, and until lately the only paper to encourage the movement. It is, therefore, with no small degree of pride and satisfaction that we record the successful launching of the National League of Exhibitors. The most important group of men in the business has been the last to come together for their mutual benefit. This alone would signify that they have had no very serious difficulties to contend with, outside of local conditions, but now it appears that a very auspicious start has been made to place the exhibitors of the country where they belong—in control of the art and profession of providing the public with its most popular form of entertainment. The axiom, "United we stand, divided we fall," is as true to-day as it was a hundred years ago. Now it is up to you, Mr. Exhibitor, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the Canadian border to the Gulf of Mexico, to rally around the banner so gallantly raised in the sixth city of the country by a few unselfish men. So get together in your various communities and organize, form your State associations and support the National movement. Let the next National Convention, in Chicago, be a fitting representation of a great industry, where thousands instead of hundreds will congregate to discuss the ways and means to its still greater advancement.

A TIMELY word is needed that may assist in establishing a more cordial feeling between exchanges and exhibitors. That the relations now existing are not as they should be, for the best interests of the picture industry, is clear to anyone who has carefully observed and investigated. There has been a tendency among some branch offices of the General Film Company to treat the exhibitor with a domineering air and to make light of his grievances. And yet when these branch managers owned their own exchanges and were engaged in strong competition, they were very careful to retain a customer by all the means in their power. Many of them do so yet, and manage the branch as if it was their own.

The General Film Company was formed to benefit the exhibitors and the trade. Licensed exhibitors throughout the country have repeatedly acknowledged the benefits obtained through the system. But a great number of them had been so used to bossing the exchange manager and dictating their own terms that they resent being treated as mere customers and not as autocrats.

There is no doubt fault on both sides. The exhibitor, while a hard-worked man, very often forgets that the exchange manager and his staff are also on edge from pressure of business. He is often inconsiderate, both in manner and reasoning, and because his bookings cannot be arranged in exact accordance with his views and wishes, he, in turn, becomes an autocrat. The impossible, while he is in such a frame of mind, must be made possible and the inevitable clash comes.

In the course of developing a perfect working system in film distribution, which is complex and subject to unavoidable hitches, experience is the principal teacher. Intelligent, cordial co-operation between the exhibitor and the exchange is the safest and shortest way to overcome the hard places. The exchange manager has no more right to dictate the exhibitor's program than has the exhibitor to dictate the number of films and prints of each subject that the exchange must buy. Why? The nature of the program means profit or loss to the exhibitor, and he knows best what his patrons demand. The exchange manager, by figuring his rentals and customers, is the best judge as to the number of films and prints of each that he can buy, so as to insure a profit and not a loss to his exchange.

The picture business is in an evolutionary stage. The time will soon arrive when exhibitors will get increased admission prices for their shows. They will then be in a position to pay a small increase in the cost of the rent of a film and, in consequence, the exchange will be able to buy more prints of feature and other film subjects. This will insure exhibitors a choice of programs and also films in better condition, as each print will not then be subjected to the present wear and deterioration. In the meantime, let cordial business relations prevail among exchanges and exhibitors. They are interdependent and have the same goal in view. That goal is the conquest of every lover of entertainment, of whatever station in life, for the moving picture.

PRODUCTIONS consisting of two reels or more are steadily gaining in public favor. Patrons will come to a moving picture house more than once to see an attraction of that character. The reason is obvious. The filming of some great opera or a popular literary or dramatic or historical subject requires more than a reel. When properly done, such a production will contain many points of beauty and interest which well warrant a second view. Such an attraction will beget more advertising from the average patron than the common one-reel product. Quality being equal, quantity counts in every inch of film. The larger production likewise makes a deeper impression on the memory and to that extent advertises itself much better than the shorter one-reel affair. The greatest lever for the raising of prices in the general run of moving picture houses is the two and three and four-reel production. With better and bigger pictures the public will readily see the fairness of bigger prices.

THE PROBLEM of the pay of the scenario writer continues to agitate itself. Some deplore the fact that the vein of humor yields shockingly small returns, others, in modestly speaking of their successes, take the public into their confidence to the extent of making known their annual income, but all unite in saying that the pay is not sufficient. We believe that their complaint is well grounded. The frightful sameness of plot and incident in the pictures of to-day must be traceable to a oneness of source, which in all probability is the overworked genius of some director or personal favorite. Note the singular in "favorite." It is generous to estimate the number of molds or types into which every moving picture of the last three months can easily be fitted as high as twelve. Some companies work on two or three and give us a kaleidoscopic view of the various studios in every three releases. A little shaking up and infusion of new blood and brains would be a wise thing in about half a dozen studios that we could name right away.

Let the producers realize that the scenario writers are constantly mingling with life as it is lived to-day, that they are friends and valuable allies of the moving picture industry, and that they are often in a better position to judge of the temper and likes and dislikes of the moving picture audience than a producer, who is "too busy." They may often be lacking in technical skill, but only the ignorant and incompetent director or editor will make such knowledge of technical skill the subject of jest or let it stand in the way of a consideration of other merits the writer may possess. Every new idea is well worth looking at and examining. Where even a small amount of talent is discovered it should be encouraged and fostered as much as possible. The habit of one producer, who used to turn unsatisfactory contributions over to the press agent of his concern to be made into funny paragraphs, is reprehensible in the highest degree. Patience, courtesy, sympathy and encouragement will be found far more profitable to the film maker in his relations to the scenario writer than an assumption of pompous superciliousness. The only thing that tells in this world is constructive work; the destructive work can safely be left to the devil.

FILM-MAKERS abroad seem to have great trouble with the duper. In Great Britain glaring instances have come to light, which according to a trade journal there "have proved, that pirated copies of American films were being manufactured and sold in large numbers." That matter was seriously discussed at a recent meeting of the Kinematograph Manufacturers' Association of Great Britain. There were many suggestions offered as to the best methods of putting an end to the nefarious practise, but opinions as to such methods differed widely. There is now some legislation pending in Parliament, but the manufacturers are by no means unanimous, as to the merits of the proposed legal remedies. Another serious grievance of the British manufacturers is the unfair release of American films, the latter being often shown in England long before the date set for their release by the manufacturers and legitimate exchanges. One case was instanced, where "an exhibitor in Philadelphia had arranged with a party to dupe films and by means of a negative made from a film, copies were printed and sent over here to several members of the trade." Biograph, Kalem and Lubin films are offered to exhibitors and exchanges six weeks ahead of the English release dates.

It would seem, that the manufacturers here ought to ask for some definite legal proof of such duping, as is alleged to have taken place in Philadelphia and then proceed against the dupers to the fullest extent of the law. The law here will make such proceedings easy. If an example were made of one or two notorious dupers, duping on this side of the water, would soon fall into "innocuous desuetude." If English films were as much sought after as the American product, the American exchanges and importers generally would feel themselves justly aggrieved, if the English makers did not to the extent of their ability, put a stop to it. A little careful investigating work ought to trace the duper and it is well worth while to trace and punish him. We here certainly are not hampered, but rather helped by the law, both in substance and in procedure.

PENNSYLVANIA, politically "corrupt and contented," has enacted a law of censorship, which is draconic in its severity. Not only must a fee of $2.50 be paid for each censoring, but the powers of the censor are arbitrary and as we firmly believe, unconstitutional. The censors are political hacks, men, that are selected because they must be taken care of. Their qualifications for the office are not at all considered. Here is a splendid field for missionary work on the part of the State organization of exhibitors in Pennsylvania. The type of SETTLEMENT workers should find the moving picture a very welcome aid, especially in the so-called slum districts, where the crime film, pure and simple, is not altogether eradicated. In a place of some size, on the lower East Side, only a few days ago a friend of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD saw a barker strut up and down before gathering crowds and between puffs from a cigarette hand out cards, printed on very cheap paper and bearing the legend: "The Great Murder Mystery." After the barker had finished his address in a loud and rasping voice, he confided to some of his friends in a stage whisper, "that it was great" and urged them to see it. The influence of such places, which is, of course, wholly bad, should be counteracted by free moving picture entertainments of a better nature, arranged by the settlement workers.

Exhibitors Rise to the Occasion.

LOOK OUT FOR SHOALS AHEAD.

Elsewhere in this number, in recording the formation of a National League of Exhibitors, we stated that the delegates tackled the problem in a business-like manner. We also were pleased to record the fact that their deliberations were conducted with a dignity and self-respect which was noticeably lacking on occasions when men in different branches of the business have convened. In giving due praise, therefore, to the personnel of the new organization, in fostering and encouraging the movement and in supporting and advocating its aims, the MOVING PICTURE WORLD has only the kindliest motives in now seeking to point out a dangerous shoal, which, if it does not wreck the organization, will seriously thwart its purpose.

Before attempting to set forth or even suggest a chart for the guidance of the Exhibitors' League, let us go back over the past two or three years and trace the rise and fall of the old Film Service Association. This was an attempt at organizing a branch of the business, which, at one time, aspired to be in control. As a governing body it had every opportunity. As a factor for the solidifying and promotion of the industry it promised much—and accomplished nothing. Its end was abject, ignominious failure.

Why?

Conflicting interests.

The manufacturers were invited to participate in their discussions, were allowed to interfere with their affairs, to even dictate their policies. Dictation was followed by usurpation, until the voice of the exchange proprietor in the affairs of the business is hushed. Once upon a time the exchange proprietor was a factor to be reckoned with. If honesty of purpose, business acumen and the spirit of independence had marked the course of the F. S. A., what could have and what would not have happened? But they truckled to the manufacturer. They sold their birthright and, in doing so, furnished the evidence that opposing interests cannot thrive together. The manufacturer is ever on the alert to get the highest price for his product; the dealer always trying to buy to better advantage. Two opposing tides met. Result: A whirlpool in which the gallant merchantman was engulfed.

Where disaster has occurred in the past it is right to plant

THE WARNING BEACON.

In launching the National Exhibitors' League, it has but narrowly escaped the shoals. Before its first voyage, ends, at the second national meeting in Chicago, in August, 1912, many changes may have been made on the chart. Events crowd each other so rapidly in this business that the captain may have to "box the compass" more than once; may even have to scuttle the ship to save himself and crew. Let us hope that he will steer it to a glorious haven in the Second City of the Union.

STAND PAT AND STAND ALONE.

The exhibitors of the country have a work before them that dwarfs into insignificance any previous attempts at organization. If they hope to succeed they must brook no interference, must court no helping hand from interests that are antagonistic though parallel to their own. They must stand for themselves and by themselves. They have already shown this spirit at Cleveland, by convening behind closed doors and even denying admission to certain exhibitors because they are also affiliated with exchanges. We commend their discretion in so doing as we have applauded the sincerity of their purchase.

But they must slightly veer their course to avoid the rocks that threaten the various ships of state. The real work of organization is yet to be accomplished. Many State associations must be launched and those already launched and not enlisted must fall into line. These State meets must be for exhibitors and FOR EXHIBITORS ONLY. It is a grave mistake to invite the co-operation, or even the displays, of the various manufacturers. They cannot get the attention to which they are entitled without seriously interfering with the work of the exhibitors' organization. It is surely beneath the dignity of the exhibitors to invite these exhibits for the sake of financial assistance. At the Cleveland gathering we met scores of exhibitors whose actual cash investment in their business exceeded many times the initial investment of any manufacturer in the field today. They are perfectly able to finance and run this league affair. It should be equally beneath the dignity of any manufacturer or group of manufacturers to attend a gathering ostensibly for the purpose of entertaining. Suppose a customer is secured. It is a sign of poor salesmanship or at least lack of faith in the merits of the product when an attempt is made to reach the pocketbook through the esophagus.

Besides, in no case can the game be worth the candle. Possibly a machine manufacturer may effect a sale, or a lobby display artist or a screen manufacturer. But the film manufacturer—never. Moreover, one would imagine that the exhibitor, in attending these meetings, would be glad of the opportunity to remove his eyes from the earmarks of his business and concentrate his mind on the ways and means of safeguarding it.

We hope that every State meeting will, therefore, hereafter be conducted by and for the exhibitor only and that the presence of the manufacturer or his agent will not be invited nor tolerated. By following such a course the exhibitors in league throughout the country will not only merit but command the respect of the other branches of the industry and they will build up an organization which will be unassailable and lasting.

Be independent.

No Sectarian Films

By W. Stephen Bush.

I FIRMLY believe that in the future development of the moving picture there will come a profitable market for films of a purely religious character. Even now the crude product which is listed and labelled as "religious" is often accepted by churches and religious institutions. So great indeed has been the demand by certain interests for the religious picture that only a short time ago the licensed manufacturers compiled and issued a special list of films of a religious character.

As the moving picture gains in prestige the various Christian churches, with an active and militant organization, will before long avail themselves of its proselytizing possibilities. Under the auspices of various church organizations plants for the making of religious pictures will in due course be erected, producers with literary knowledge and religious training and not without technical skill will be engaged to conduct them. It matters little whether such producers are priests, ministers or laymen. Film exchanges will become part of the working force of most churches.

We expect that the Roman Catholic Church more especially will with great advantage make the moving picture subservient to its own ends. That church has ever been the friend and protector of art. At all times in her history she has been quick to adapt herself to altered conditions and make use for her own purposes of inventions and discoveries. Let us not forget that the drama of today is in large measure the outgrowth of the old miracle play, of which the Passion Play of Oberammergau is a notable survival. In her discipline as well as her theology, she of all Christian churches shows the most liberal comprehension of the dramatic art and evinces the greatest toleration and sympathy for its exponents.

In the meantime it should be thoroughly impressed upon each and every film producer that no greater mistake can be made than to appeal through his product to purely sectarian approval or to foist sectarian theories and doctrines upon the general moving picture public. No one fact is to-day more widely and more practically accepted than religious toleration. The people in this country live in religious peace and amity and abhor religious controversy of any kind. The average American audience deeply resents and sharply rejects any film intended to make the moving picture the medium of sectarian teaching. Common sense and common tact would seem to forbid the preaching of sectarian morals on the screen of a moving picture house. People who go to the photoplay theater are composed of all denominations, and no film maker in his senses will dream of offering subjects of a purely sectarian nature to a mixed public. Men, women and children do not go to moving picture houses for religious edification and still less to be excited by religious controversy. The Catholic portion of an audience would feel offended at any special glorification of Protestantism, and the Protestants have an equal right to resent an obtrusive flattery of Catholic ideas. The Jews again would have a right to feel aggrieved over a film comparing their religion unfavorably with that of the Christians. The sensible film maker with even a trace of the genuine American spirit will keep away from the shoals and rocks of religious specialties and controversies.

The foregoing remarks are occasioned by our having seen a reel, called "The Broken Vows," which on the whole is about the worst and most offensive picture we have seen in a long, long time. The picture in a crude and clumsy way seeks to sustain and glorify the purely sectarian doctrine, that a priest or monk must never leave his monastery, and if by any chance he does so and gets married and begets children, he must desert wife and child and go back to his cell. We have no quarrel with either celibacy or monasticism, and much has been said by good men in favor of both, but we respectfully submit that such a subject is not fit for presentation in a moving picture house, which must and does cater to the general public. Even the most zealous Catholic priest would not wish to go on a stage and preach these theories to audiences, representing all shades of religious opinion. The place for such exhibitions is the church or the sectarian school, but never the stage, silent or otherwise.

The man who takes money from the general public with the promise to amuse, entertain and inform, breaks his part of the contract when he begins to preach sectarianism in pictures. When the money comes from all classes and all denominations alike, the film maker cannot afford to cater to just a small portion of the people and offend or bore the rest. Even where a religious picture has an historical background it is, as a rule, not a safe thing to offer to the general public. With the historic background missing and nothing to fall back on for the success of the picture but a sectarian point of view, always one-sided and narrow, the so-called religious picture becomes to the general public both a nuisance and an abomination and challenges dissent and controversy.

From a purely sectarian point of view the story told in this film, "The Broken Vows," revolting as it must always remain to a normal and healthy mind, is not impossible, but even from a sectarian point of view it is very crudely, ignorantly and offensively put together. There is indeed a taint of cheapness running through the whole production, which culminates in the attempt to show the beginning of a tour around the world by the display of a $1.50 valise and the study of a time table. This, however, is not a very serious objection. Its inaccuracies from a Catholic point of view are so glaring that even the few whom the sectarian character of the play might otherwise please, will be unable to repress a feeling of disgust. Some license must be allowed to a film maker in the matter of religious garb, and that detail is therefore quickly and leniently passed over in silence, but—what order of professional monks does not require its members to submit to the tonsure? The monks in this picture are all remarkable for their splendid growth of hair and there is no sign of a tonsure or of baldness in the oldest of them. Again: In what monastey is an utter stranger taken from the gate to the choral devotions of the fathers? Few things are more impressive than a choir of monks with ascetic and spiritualized faces and that unconscious dignity that is born of a long and sincere contemplation of things eternal. The monks in this picture had nothing monk-like about them except the cowls, and as the old monastic proverb runs: "Cucullus non facit monachum" ("The cowl does not make the monk"), neither in reality nor in moving pictures.

Is it probable that a young priest will become so enamored of a woman's photograph that almost in a moment he forgets the teaching and training of years and "runs away"? If it were the picture of an old sweetheart or of some woman whom he had an opportunity of seeing frequently and with whom he had fallen in love, I could understand the situation better. The young monk knows absolutely nothing about the original of the photograph except what a stranger tells him, to wit, that it is the picture of a woman who has rejected his, the stranger's, offer of marriage. Is it likely that for the sake of a mere photograph the young priest would forsake deep-rooted convictions and become in the eyes of his friends an apostate? It does not even appear that the monk goes away for the purpose of hunting for the original of the photograph, not at all. When we see him again after his disappearance from the monastery he is "a successful author," possibly a moving picture scenario writer. He has no idea where the original of the photo is and does not even know whether she is dead or alive. He meets the lady by the merest accident at some social function. A marriage follows, which, of course, from the sectarian point of view, is an absolute nullity. The lady, a devout Catholic, discovers after a child has been born of the union that her husband is a runaway monk (if such a thing be possible in this age), and she not only announces her desire to abandon him, but actually takes him in a carriage to the gate of the monastery and leaves him there. He, somewhat dazed, pulls an extremely cheap and improbable looking bell-rope, and when the door opens walks back into the monastery.

Only sectarianism, bordering on the fanatical, will without vigorous protest accept such a situation, but the worst is yet to come. The fact that a child of this marriage, condemned by the church, exists is most shockingly obtruded on the audience. The child, from the sectarian and the mother's own point of view, a nameless, fatherless waif, is made to say its prayers before the mother and the father is shown in his cell, as the press agent puts it so beautifully, "his face illumined by the soft moonbeams."

We have the profoundest respect for all spiritual and religious sentiment, whether it becomes visible in the shovel hat of the Quaker, the cowl of the monk or the broad phylacteries of the Israelite, but we cannot too strongly condemn this pictorial sectarianism. It needlessly adds to the burdens of the exhibitor and to the trials of moving picture audiences. With such pictures the exhibitor can make neither friends nor money.

A word of sympathy is due to the actors, who had to see this ghastly affair through as best they could. The thankless part of the rejected suitor was well acted. The actor to whose lot fell the playing of the monk's rôle showed no mimic power whatever; as monk, as ex-monk, as author, as luckless husband, as reconverted monk, he was always the same, pleasant to look at, because he has a good presence and a fine, manly figure, but the task was too hard for him and he did not exactly know what to do.

The whole production, aside from the objections heretofore urged, leaves a most unpleasant impression, like the memory of the sounds of a delicate musical instrument touched by coarse and unskilled hands.

Exhibitors Form National League

Report of Organization Meeting

NO longer can it be said that no National Organization of Motion Picture Exhibitors exists. Answering to the call of the Ohio Exhibitors' League, and in recognition of the absolute necessity of a national organization capable of undertaking and achieving large things, nearly 200 representative exhibitors from ten States gathered at Cleveland, Ohio, on August 1, 2 and 3. Together with seventy exhibitors of the Forest City, these progressive photoplay theater owners met in secret session at Weber's Hall on the dates mentioned, and perfected an organization which we confidently believe will receive the approval of the exhibitors of every State not yet represented, expressed by an attendance of over one thousand bona fide progressive picture men at the convention in Chicago next year.

The exhibitors and manufacturers and supply men's representatives began arriving some days before the first meeting, but the grand rush of enthusiastic arrivals commenced on Monday, July 31, and continued until Wednesday morning. The first session of the convention was called to order by Mr. Neff, president of the Ohio State Exhibitors' League, on Tuesday morning at 10:30. Mr. Neff was elected to the temporary chairmanship, and Mr. C. M. Christenson, secretary of the committee on arrangements, was elected secretary pro tem. The Michigan delegates then presented to Chairman Neff a handsome gavel, and expressed the hope that on the next occasion when it will be used, Detroit will be honored by hearing the sound. Rev. Mr. Gregg, of the Civic Reform of Cleveland, spoke briefly, welcoming the first national convention to the city, and stating his attitude towards the photoplay. He hoped the exhibitors would work not only for their own immediate interests, but would also demand that certain types of questionable subjects should be suppressed. Prize fight pictures were subjected to especial censure, as well as those in which murders and other criminal acts were given undue prominence. The exhibitors showed that they were in full accord with the suggestions of the reverend gentleman by applauding him at several times during the course of his remarks, and very liberally at the conclusion.

Mayor Baehr, of Cleveland, who is known to be a frequent patron of the moving picture theater, in a word of welcome to the delegates paid a high compliment to the silent drama. He said: "My feeling toward moving picture shows is best expressed by the fact that I never miss the opportunity of visiting one whenever I can possibly spare the time. I like them. I think they are great. Nothing else I know of combines so much entertainment with the educational value found in so many of the pictures. I like Western prairie plays when they are not too melodramatic, but historical subjects and industrials, I think, should be featured more numerously than they are."

The meeting then adjourned until the afternoon, and as all succeeding sessions were secret, members only being admitted, to the deliberations, we are unable to give a complete account of the other sessions of the convention. We are able and glad, however, to state that much work of importance has been outlined and committees named to carry on the plans. This convention was by all odds, according to the unanimous testimony of all visitors and delegates, the most enthusiastic one ever held anywhere, whether State or city organizations were concerned. The name adopted by the body is the Motion Picture League of America, and the officers are: President, M. A. Neff, Cincinnati; secretary, C. M. Christenson, Cleveland, and treasurer, J. J. Rieder, Jackson, Mich.

The social side of the convention began Tuesday afternoon at 2 p. m. with an automobile ride in twenty-five autos, lasting over three hours, during which the principal places of interest in the city and nearly all the parks were visited. Whether this entertainment was responsible for it or not, the delegates were all in a rare good humor when they returned. After the Wednesday morning session, Mr. Brulatour, president of the Sales Company, acted as host of the entire crowd at an elaborate luncheon served at the Hollenden Hotel.

THE PROCEEDINGS DAY BY DAY.

Tuesday, August 1.

The preliminary meeting was called to order by President M. A. Neff, of the Exhibitors' League of Ohio, at 10.30 a. m. He urged upon the delegates present the necessity for the formation of a National League to govern and aid in carrying out the resolutions adopted by the various State associations. The motion being put before the house, it was unanimously agreed that an association known as the National League of Exhibitors be formed. The election of officers being next in order, Mr. M. A. Neff was unanimously elected to serve as president for the term of one year.

Mr. C. M. Christenson, of Cleveland, was elected secretary, and Mr. J. J. Rieder, of Jackson, Mich., treasurer.

Vice presidents were elected from seven different states to compose a board of directors, as follows: S. C. Morris, Cleveland; William Ullman, Detroit; J. H. Dickson, Winchester, Ind.; H. C. Farley, Montgomery, Ala.; H. G Lux, Utica, N. Y.; W. J. Sweeney, Chicago, and H. F. B. McLain, Washington.

Committees on by-laws and for various other purposes were then appointed and the meeting adjourned. Representatives from the various machine manufacturers, film manufacturers and other branches of the business entertained groups of the exhibitors to luncheon and refreshments, after which all embarked in forty or more automobiles which had been provided by the Cleveland exhibitors and enjoyed a four-hour ride through the parks and places of interest.

Following the automobile ride, the exhibitors met again, this time in secret session, and discussed the by-laws, fees of admission and the general business conduct of the National League.

There being no provision made for the display of goods while the sessions were in progress, the manufacturers' representatives swapped stories and refreshments in the nearby thirst parlors. At one of these "adjournments" was heard the only inharmonious note of the whole three days' convention, and that only a slight one. It appears that while the film manufacturers had been invited to attend and exhibit their films, no provision had been made for a general place for display. With commendable enterprise, Mr. R. R. Nehls and the other representatives of the licensed manufacturers had secured the Hippodrome (Cleveland's largest theater) for a display of licensed film on Wednesday morning before the opening session. Representatives of Independent manufacturers demanded that their films be also shown at the same time and in the same theater. The Hippodrome being a Licensed house, this was inviting a cancellation of its license, so the Licensed representatives declined to comply with the request and cancelled their own engagement. The report, published in another paper, that Mr. John Rock, representing the Vitagraph Company, wired to the Patents Company and received instructions that if Independent film was shown in the Hippodrome that all the licenses of the Keith & Proctor circuit would be cancelled is a deliberate falsehood and only voiced to try and promote ill-feeling over what was but a trivial incident.

Wednesday, August 2.

The Exhibitors' League met in secret session at 10:30. Reports were read from the various committees and applications from members received and acted upon. The State of Indiana qualified for membership, its delegates having met together in the interim and formed themselves into a State Association.

Previous to the opening of this session, the exhibitors gathered on the steps of the postoffice and a panoramic photograph was made. Pathe Freres had also sent a camera man from New York with instructions to get something for a feature article in the Pathe Weekly, but as the exhibitors were pressed for time in which to transact their business, the Pathe photographer had to be content with the same grouping.

At noon the exhibitors were invited by the Sales Company manufacturers to partake of an elaborate repast at the Hotel Hollenden. President J. A. Brulatour came all the way from the White Mountains, where he was spending his vacation with his family, to preside. He availed himself of the occasion to make a glowing address in behalf of the Sales Company and the improvement in the product of its manufacturers, calling upon the manufacturers present by name to rise and bow their acknowledgments. He explained how this progress had been made against heavy odds; how they had been compelled to use all makeshifts of cameras in order to keep out of jail, and how they had won round after round of the fight on camera patents until they were now in a position to use any camera without interference. Mr. Brulatour also tuched upon the litigation that had been started on the Pross shutter and Latham loop patents, and assured the exhibitors present that the Sales Company was prepared to defend any and all suits brought against the exhibitor. Summons of complaint, he said, had already been served by the Patents Company on two New York exhibitors and the Sales Company was asking for injunctions in every State of the Union against the Patents Company, restraining them from bringing any other suits until a test case had been argued and the patent adjudicated.

Mr. Herbert Miles, secretary of the Sales Company, corroborated Mr. Brulatour's offer of protection and called attention to a pronunciamento from the Sales Company which rested beside each delegate's plate and to blank forms for filling in the name of the defendant, the name of the theater and other information to be sent in to the Sales Company's lawyers in the event of suit being brought against any of the exhibitors present.

Mr. Neff, on behalf of the exhibitors, briefly thanked their host for the collation and for the interest taken in their welfare, and the exhibitors then adjourned to Weber's Hall again, where they met in secret session until 6.30 p. m. Mr. L. H. Becht, of the Mall Theater, had kindly given the use of his theater for the evening for a display of coming Independent releases, which exhibition was largely attended by the delegates. Among the films shown was the State Right film, "Jerusalem Delivered, or the Crusaders," Tom Quill, of the World Feature Film Company, being on hand booking State rights.

At 8:30 o'clock everyone in attendance at the convention was invited by the entertainment committee to participate in a two hours' sail on the lake on the large steamer "Eastland." The exhibitors found that even there they could not be free from shop talk. Enterprising emissaries of the Sales Company had earlier in the day obtained permission to install a moving picture machine on the after deck, and there, with the lights of the steamer turned out, they were regaled with reel after reel of Independent films and bright sallies of wit between the claimants for popularity. The Licensed film representatives, realizing how adroitly their competitors had "put one over on them," accepted the incident in good grace and enjoyed the open air show or tripped the light fantastic on the deck below.

It was a happy inspiration on the part of the entertainment committees to arrange for the sail on the lake before the banquet provided in Weber's restaurant by the League. Although the day had been sultry and stifling, it was a cool and comfortable gathering that lined up to the tables about midnight and ate and listened to impromptu speeches until far into the morning hours. Harmony and sociability reigned. The delegates were happy because they had accomplished their purpose. The manufacturers and exchange men present were happy at seeing their customers happy and enjoying themselves. A number of ladies present added much to the attractiveness and gayety of the occasion, not forgetting to mention Mrs. Herbert Miles, who never misses a filmy social function.

After the first course a clever vaudeville performance was presented through the kindness of Mr. Bert Marshall, manager of one of the vaudeville booking agencies. Mr. Jack Howard sang so well the song, "I'll Be with You in Honeysuckle Time," that he was vociferously encored.

Secretary C. M. Christenson then read a telegram from Mr. W. N. Selig, president of the Selig Polyscope Company:

Chicago, Ill., August 2, 1911.

Stanley H. Twist, Convention Hall, National League of Exhibitors, Cleveland, Ohio: Kindly express to the exhibitors of America assembled my sincere and best wishes for the success of their organization and my deep regrets at not being able to be present at this convention. Extend to them my most earnest invitation to hold their next convenion in Chicago and at that time visit and inspect the Diamond "S" organization. William N. Selig.

The following telegram was also received and read from Mr. Phil Gleichman, of Detroit:

Detroit, Mich., August 2, 1911.

C. M. Christenson, secretary Exhibitors' League: Congratulations to the exhibitors of the country on their first convention. Accept my best wishes for a successful organization that may prosper and live to the benefit of the entire moving picture industry. The Cadillac Film Company, of Detroit, and the exhibitors of Michigan stand for what is best for all. Phil Gleichman.

Mr. Christenson then announced that Mr. Hobday, of the Employers' Association of Cleveland, was present at the banquet and called upon him for a few words. Mr. Hobday's address, which was delivered in stirring style, was so pregnant with words of cheer and good advice that we give it in full on page 444.

After Mr. Hobday's profound remarks, a little comedy was in order and Mr. Christenson called upon Mr. Max Levey, one of the oldest exhibitors in the State of Michigan. Calling for silence, Mr. Levey made the almost unnecessary explanation that he was once a vaudeville star, having played safely in the local Keith houses at one time. Following the previous eloquent speaker, he said, reminded him of the story of two negro venders of popcorn and peanuts. Both were calling their goods on a busy street. One had a stentorian voice, shouting at intervals "Getcher popcornpeanuts, popcornpeanuts, getemhyer." The other man had a wheezy voice and as his competitor drew his breath the weak-lunged one would put his hand to his mouth and say "Hyer, too. Hyer, too." I am like the latter darkey and can only give my hearty endorsement to the remarks of the previous speaker by saying "Hyer, too. Hyer, too." In telling a story of his own race, Mr. Levey said he did not mean it as a reflection against his own nationality of which he was proud, but as a typical illustration of the business spirit which is characteristic of them. Ikey and his good wife had kept a clothing store in New York for years, paying such close attention to business that Mrs. Ikey one day complained that he never took her out any more. So as Ikey the second had attained years of wisdom his father one day entrusted him with the store while he took Mrs. Ikey to Coney Island. "But fadder," said young Ikey, "I don't know what costedst the clothes yet." "Oh, dot is easy alretty,'!' said the father, "Choost look for the tags on the clothes and count the dots. Se dis von on dis suit. One, doo, dree—see, there be den dots on the dag vich means den dollars. Den dots, den dollars, see." "Oh, dot's easy alretty," said Ikey and away went his parents. Six hours later they returned to the store. "Vell, Ikey, did you sell somedings yet?" "You bet I did, it is a shnap to run a store alretty yet. I sold a suit of glothes for fifteen tollers and—" "Vat you say?" his father broke in, knowing he had no fifteen dollar suits. "Vat hav you did Izzy, did you save the tag?" "You bet I did," said the youthful merchant and they began counting. "One, doo, dree, and so on, fourteen, fifdeen! Good work, Ikey! Oy, Oy, God bless de flies."

Mr. E. Mandelbaum, of the Lake Shore Film Exchange, was called on for a few remarks and expressed, in well-chosen words, his pleasure at the progress made by the exhibitors in organizing and assuring them of the co-operation of the exchanges in all that was for the good of the industry.

Mr. J. E. Willis was asked to say a few words for the General Film Company, being the resident manager of the Cleveland branch. Mr. Willis explained that he, being only an employee, could not speak for the company in the absence of any of its officers. He personally thanked the exhibitors for their invitation to be present and, wishing them success in their undertaking, begged to be excused.

Mr. Herbert Miles, though apparently young in years, was called upon as the oldest exhibitor, to tell some of his early experiences. Mr. Miles said in part:

"Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, it was late in '96 or early in '97 when I first opened a moving picture show in Seattle, Wash. It was easy money then. I charged 25 cents admission, running a one-reel show. (Laughter.) The initial cost of installing the 'hole in the wall' was $146 or thereabuts, including everything required except the 'hole' itself. As it was before the day of film exchanges I had to buy my reel outright, paying $150 for each change of program. Naturally I did not change daily. (Laughter.) On the contrary, I kept running the one reel until almost every man, woman and child in the city had seen it not only once, but several times. I paid my operator $4 per night—the ghost walking every night. For the use of the room I was obliged to give the owner one-fourth of the receipts, also payable each night. In order to get his full due he acted as ticket taker and it kept me busy to see that he limited his percentage of the receipts to the agreed figure. Whenever business got slow, so that we cleared not over one-half of our usual nightly profit of $80, we sent East for a new film. You will see that it did not take the show long to pay back the investment—about three times a week. I well remember noticing that one of the reels shipped to me from the East bore the mysterious imprint 'P. F.' I wanted to know where they came from and arrange for a more regular source of supply. So I came East in '99 and learned that 'P. F.' stood for Pathe Freres—that was before the day of the red rooster trade mark. My brother, who was also an exhibitor in San Francisco, wrote me that as new shows were being started in that section, we could do a paying business in renting films to other exhibitors if we laid in a supply. So I rented an office in Fourteenth Street, New York, adjoining the offices of the Biograph Company, and started what is generally conceded to be the first film exchange, shipping a number of reels to my brother and forming the Miles Bros. Film

Exchange of New York and San Francisco. Our first rental rate was $15 a reel, whether it was kept one hour, one day or one week. The limit, however, being seven days.

"Having had experience in every line of the business, from ticket taker, operator, theater manager, exchange manager and manufacturer, I may be credited with knowing something of the business. Although now secretary of the Motion Picture Distributing and Sales Company, I am still one of you, as I have a financial interest in several theaters in the East. I realize what are your difficulties—and that they are real difficulties. I realize the necessity of your having a strong organization, through which to make your needs known and your voice heard. As a representative of the Sales Company I wish to assure you that we are always ready to co-operate with you, either as a body or as individuals in overcoming the obstacles in your way. I thank you heartily for the opportunity of addressing you to-night and extend my sincere congratulations to you on the success of this convention and the launching of your organization."

Mr. R. R. Nehls, representing George Kleine, was next called upon for a few remarks. He congratulated the promoters of the National League in bringing together so intelligent and representative a body of exhibitors. He believed that the business had hitherto suffered from the fact that there had been no representative body of exhibitors to protect their interests against unfair local legislation and combat the sentiment against the motion picture that was now only gradually disappearing on the merits of the picture itself. He pointed out to the exhibitors that they were the logical means of communication between the film manufacturer and the public. If the exhibitor did not carefully make note of the reception given by the public to various kinds of films and convey their observations to the manufacturer, how was the manufacturer to know what were the most popular subjects to produce. Mr. Nehls urged upon the exhibitors to listen not only to the remarks and applause of the less cultured and more demonstrative patrons of their theaters, especially when sensational drama and Indian and cowboy pictures were presented, but to be guided also by the silent disapproval of the more refined element. He urged upon them the wisdom of presenting more pictures of the educational, scenic and high class historical drama type, such being attractive to all classes of society and did not neglect the opportunity to say that such could be found among the productions of the Gaumont and Urban-Eclipse Companies, which he had the honor to represent.

Mr. J. P. Chalmers, on behalf of the press, praised the efforts of the men whose work had at last culminated in the formation of a National League. He said that he had attended every important gathering of film men in the history of the business in this country, but never one which was composed of a higher class of citizenship. He had attended all the conventions of the film exchanges, none of which had been so harmonious. The prevailing spirit which seemed to permeate this gathering of exhibitors was to get and to give a square deal. He congratulated the officers and members on the businesslike way in which they attacked the various problems which were somewhat new to them and said that such enthusiasm and determination could only have one result—success to the organization. If States throughout the country would follow the lead of Ohio and organize and enrol under the banner of the National League it would give the exhibitor insurance on his invested capital and the recognition that they deserved as men of standing in their community. He pledged his support and encouragement to the movement and hoped soon to record the establishment of an association in every State.

Mr. E. J. Mock said that the requirements of a public speaker were far different from those of a writer. Give him a pencil and a pad of paper and he would talk to the exhibitors at his best as he promised to do in the next issue of his publication. He joined in the expressions of good will and encouragement and said that he would have pleasure in welcoming them to Chicago next year.

Mr. Alfred H. Saunders welcomed the formation of the Exhibitors' League and expressed the wish that one thing they might accomplish would be to "sweep the patent litigation into the sea where it belonged." He then went back over the early history of the business and told of how one of his osculatory experiences with the fair sex had been recorded on a film by the English inventor, W. Friese-Greene, before the Edison patents were heard of.

Mr. A. M. Kennedy, of the American Film Manufacturing Company, was next called upon and surprised all with his ability as an after dinner speaker. He commended the efforts of the men who had worked hard and unselfishly to bring about this gathering and congratulated the exhibitors upon forming a strong organization in what had hitherto been the only unorganized branch of the business. The speaker scored a hit and evoked general applause when he declared that the National League of Exhibitors would become the strongest of all the affiliated bodies of labor or capital in the whole industry and that through it the exhibitors would eventually become the masters of the situation. He congratulated the exhibitors present upon the fairness of their attitude in discussing such subjects as had been brought to their attention and was so enthusiastic as to the general benefit that he hoped every State and important city of the Union would take up in earnest the work of organization that had been so successfully started. He thanked the exhibitors for their invitation to be present on this occasion and looked forward to extending them a royal welcome at their next annual meeting in Chicago.

The following telegram was read from W. H. Swanson:

Denver, Colo., Aug. 3, 1911.

Chairman Committee National Exhibitors,
Weber's Hall, Superior Ave., Cleveland, O.,

Kindly express my regrets to assembled convention at my not being able to attend. I earnestly hope convention will bear out efforts of having men who will materialize what we desire in co-operating with us in general. Hope you will have successful time. Answer. WM. SWANSON.

President Neff, in his closing remarks, said that as he studied the faces of those in attendance at this gathering, and noted the unusually high average of mentality that had been so markedly displayed, he marvelled that the organization of the National Exhibitors' League had been postponed to such a late date. The ripeness of the occasion augured well for the fruitage and he pledged his best efforts to make real the promise of good results.

Thursday, August 3.

From 8 until 10:30 a. m. an exhibition of advance licensed films was given in the Dreamland Theater, the use of which was kindly granted by Secretary Christenson, one of the proprietors. The projection in this theater is excellent and the exhibition was much enjoyed, especially the first release of the Pathe weekly, a topical film which promises to be very popular.

Secret sessions of the league were again held in Weber's Hall at 11 a. m. and 3 p. m. The National League then adjourned to meet again in convention at Chicago on the second Tuesday of August, 1912.

Group of Delegates.

It is with great pleasure that the writer wishes to go on record as saying that the deliberations of the first representative gathering of exhibitors was marked with decorum and earnestness. The mental calibre and social standing of the exhibitors present and the enthusiasm with which they took up the work in hand was an eye-opener to the manufacturers' representatives and exchange men who measured the success of former gatherings of film men by the entertainment provided and looked upon such gatherings chiefly as an opportunity to get together for bacchanalian orgies. Whatever of this may have occurred in Cleveland was not participated in or countenanced by the exhibitors. They were there for business and attended to that business, providing at the same time a judicious amount of entertainment to their members and guests.

MANUFACTURERS' EXHIBITS.

Machine Display.

The Edengraph was represented by Mr. F. M. Swett.

The Edison Kinetoscope was represented by Mr. Bernard M. Corbett.

The Motiograph by Mr. F. A. Clark and Mr. Lindsay A. Woodward.

The Powers Cameragraph by Mr. H. B. Coles.

The Simplex by the inventor, Mr. Frank J. Cannock, and Mr. H. Renbold.

Mr. E. E. Oliver, of Cleveland, exhibited a Powers No. 5, rebuilt with outside shutter attachment and hardened cam and sprocket, which he said was equal to any new machine.

Bernard Corbett, who represented the Edison machine, is a prince of good fellows. The exhibition room being a part of the hall where the secret sessions were held, neither he nor the other machine representatives had a fair show. But Corbett was on the job late and early and when not beside his machine was doing the honors for his company gracefully. Like all jovial salesmen, Mr. Corbett has a peculiar kind of humor. A neat card attached to the front of the Edison machine bore the following inscription:

"When you meet a knocker
Strike him where his brains ought to be
And kick him where his brains are."

And Corbett, like his chief, John Pelzer, is no lightweight, which accounts for the fact that the knocker kept at a respectful distance.

The Mirror Screen was ably represented by Mr. F. B. Bloomfield, who tated around in his pockets samples of both of his heavy specialties.

The "Sunlight" Curtain was ably represented by Mr. A. W. Wylie. Any exhibitor who fell under the spell of Mr. Wylie's eloquence was bound to be converted to "Sunlight" ideas. A large sample screen was on view in the hall. One of the important features of this curtain is a stretching frame which permits tightening up the screen, so that an absolutely flat surface is presented to the light rays. This surface being of a highly reflective metallic substance, it is possible to obtain adequately lighted pictures with a much lower amperage than usual. "Sunlight" curtain is being installed this week at the new Penn Square Theater in Cleveland, one of the handsomest exclusive picture houses yet built anywhere and which we will fully describe in a coming issue of the paper.

"Mirroroide," another metallic surfaced screen, was also shown. It is furnished in various degrees of reflecting surfaces, is flexible and waterproof and fireproof.

The Novelty Slide Company, of New York City, sent an exhibit of announcement slides. There was no opportunity to display them so, we are told, they disappeared as souvenirs.

Supplies.

The Lake Shore Film & Supply Company had an exhibit for themselves and the General Electric Company.

Exhibitors' Advertising Company had on view a number of handsome easel frames for displaying programs. A large variety of attractive designs were shown and we believe that they were rewarded with many orders.

Film Manufacturers.

Powers Picture Plays, represented by Mr. P. A. Powers; Yankee Films, by Isidor Bernstein; Imp Films, by Mr. Stern; Rex, by Joe Engel; Champion, by Mark M. Dintenfass. The film displays of other independent manufacturers not represented in person were well taken care of by officials of the Sales Company. John Rock represented the Vitagraph interests. An advance view had been promised of the first edition of the "Vitagraph Monthly of Current Events," but it failed to arrive. 'Steen times John called at or phoned to the various express companies and the G. F. exchange and 'steen times he proceeded to drown his disappointment. Kosmik films were represented by Mr. R. R. Nehls; the Diamond "S" by Mr. Stanley H. Twist; Essanay by Mr. R. Day; Pathe Freres by K. W. Linn and H. Obrock, Jr.

The chases between Issy Bernstein (Yankee) and Joe Engel (Rex) in their efforts to get time and opportunity to show their respective wares would have furnished Nestor Horsley with good comedy for his Mutt and Jeff series.

Out of season and in season, late and early, Engel could be seen rushing around with a reel under his arm. If you happened within earshot this is what you heard: "Come and I will show you the next Rex release. It is a peach." Rex banners were everywhere. If you laid down your hat, "Rex Films" in gilt letters would be found pasted inside the crown. Even the ladies could not escape the decorations of the irrepressible Engel.

However successful the convention may have been from the exhibitors' viewpoint, it was a disappointment to the manufatcurers who sent exhibits. No provision was made for a display room separate from the meeting room. But if a separate exhibition room had been provided it would have interfered with the business of the meeting, therefore, as we suggest elsewhere, the manufacturer would do well to absent himself from future State gatherings—at least until the Exhibitors' League is a complete organization.

This paper was represented by Mr. J. P. Chalmers and Mr. B. G. Drummond, the local representative. Walter Volker, the uniformed messenger of the Chicago office of the Moving Picture World was also in attendance and was the mascot of the gathering and made many friends by his polite attendance to the wants of the exhibitors' and manufacturers' representatives. The picture shows him in the center of the boosters for the Edison, Edengraph and Motiograph machines.

IMPORTANCE OF TRADE ORGANIZATIONS

An Address Delivered Before the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League at Cleveland, Ohio

BY ATTORNEY EDWARD HOBDAY,
Secretary of the Cleveland Employers' Association.

MR. PRESIDENT, Ladies and Gentlemen and members of the National Exhibitors' League, I come as a special messenger from the Employers' Association of Cleveland, an organization comprised of Cleveland's leading manufacturers, employers and business men.

It was their intent to bid you welcome to Cleveland; but, appearing at the eleventh hour, I fear that we are playing the role of speeding the departing guest.

Your endeavor to create a national organization meets with our hearty approval and we extend to you that co-operation and support which business men should always give to other business men engaged in the worthy cause of maintaining proper organization.

The motion picture business is a great business. Six hundred shows are licensed in New York City. There are more than 10,000 of these places in the United States. The average daily attendance is between four and five million, about 20 per cent. being children. Millions and millions of dollars are represented by the industry. If the people of the United States spend five million nickels a day to see your shows, that is $250,000 a day or $91,250,000 a year.

If each theater represents only an average investment of $5,000, a very conservative sum, it means for 12,000 theaters an investment of $60,000,000. Trade journals, film supply concerns, supply houses and the concerns supplying exhibitors with trade sundries and the furniture and paraphanalia used in the business represents millions and millions of dollars. The moving picture business is a great business and you, gentlemen, have every reason in the world to feel proud that you are part of this immense enterprise, and that you are meeting here to-day to promote your general welfare.

When the moving picture shows first started they were not taken seriously; they were looked upon much as the old Punch and Judy show. To-day all that is changed. Moving picture shows to-day are playing a great part in American life by daily furnishing four to five million human beings with amusement and knowledge. They are a great educative force. By this remarkable invention all the wonderful things that are happening in the outside world come to your patrons. Many have no fine books, many cannot read, of those who can read by far the vast majority have neither the time nor money to travel and see world's wonders and interesting sights. But the moving picture theater brings these things to their very doors.

For five or ten cents they escape from the monotonous hundrum, the stern realities of life. Strange countries, new, strange, and interesting people, the beauty of the Rhine, the glories of the Alps, romantic Venice, Europe's sublime architecture, the picturesque places of Europe and the Orient, the glory that was Greece and the grandeur that was Rome, the pageantry of the past, stirring historical events, the world's drama and life, present and past. Industrial methods and processes are shown, wine making, fishing, the great grain farms of the West and Northwest, elephants, piling teak in India, Oriental rug making, salmon industry, glass blowing, and many others.

The moving picture show is travel, education, drama, instruction, amusement, beauty and entertainment. A film requiring but a few minutes to exhibit tells a story with more lasting impression than a book requiring hours to read. The moving picture is seeing the thing itself.

Relative to your organization, I say to you, gentlemen, that organization is a sine qua non. If you would promote your general welfare you must have organization.

Under modern conditions the object of organization is to promote your general welfare:

1. As to trade conditions.
2. Legislatively.
3. As to the general public.

In all these fields of activity you will, in the exercise of your efforts, be confronted by and have to cope with organization. You can successfully negotiate or cope with organization only by meeting organization with organization.

1. As to trade conditions.

If you gentlemen engaged in this vast enterprise involving many millions of dollars would have equitable and fair conditions prevail as to financial matters you must have organization. You should receive substantial benefits as well as confer them in business. But the strongest of you alone is weak; although banded together, acting in unison, systematically through an organization you can produce the requisite results to enable you in a financial way to put into effect the business square deal, to commercially deal on an equitable basis with fair profit to yourself and others.

The labor and industrial question is also involved under this head. Labor is federated and organized. It is daily becoming more and more the biggest problem of the employer. The adjustment of relations between employer and employee in this free country must be along fair, square and American lines. But only through organization can you make the right adjustment or settlement of the labor question.

2. As to legislative matters.

In this regard I speak to you not only as a representative of the employers of Cleveland, but as a lawyer. Under modern complex business life, the business man constantly comes into contact with the law. The laws are yearly coming nearer to adequately providing for the complex conditions of modern industry. New business conditions occasion new or changed laws. The laws in so far as they apply to your business should be fair, right and reasonable. But honest men endeavoring to do the fair thing may err and make mistakes in these legislative matters. If you would secure the passage of proper or necessary laws, and prevent the passage of improper legislation, whether in the form of National or State statutes or city ordinances, the best results can only be produced by concerted action through an organization. With it you are strong; without it you are weak.

3. As to the general public.

The general public makes your laws and city ordinances, and is the support of your business. Most laws which last and are enforced are merely the legislative crystalization of a public sentiment. The highest law is the will of the people. Laws and institutions change as public sentiment is moulded and changed. But public sentiment is open to argument, persuasion and conviction. It changes. On new propositions it may be moulded. You may be right, but you are in the minority and unless you win the public to your way of thinking, unless public sentiment is moulded rightly, no practical result for good will follow. In this particular nothing can be accomplished without organization.

In closing, gentlemen, I cannot too strongly emphasize the importance, first, of your local organizations co-operating with local employers and manufacturers. Every city and town should have its organization, which should affiliate itself with the local employers' association. It is only by all employers and business men acting together and in concert that the best results can be produced.

Second, of supporting your trade journals and publications. The power of the press is mighty. It is at present the greatest moulder of public sentiment we have. Day by day, and little by little, it forms and moulds public opinion. More people are reached through its columns than any man can bring within the sound of his voice. An organization can have no more effective medium of expression than the trade publication, which is devoted to its interests. Bestow your charity where you will; but in good business, support a trade publication which supports you.

The triumphs of war, the victories of peace, the greatness of present day civilization, trade, commerce, business and industry have all been attained through organization. Civilization began with organization. It is the doorway of the world's progress. The pinnacle of business success can only be attained through organization.

The employers of Cleveland are glad that you have taken a serious business seriously by organizing. We wish you all possible success and sincerely hope that you will become a power for making good business conditions, and that you will maintain local organizations in every city and town in the United States wherever there are two or more exhibitors, and that every exhibitor will become a member of this organization.

Reviews of Notable Films

"RORY O'MORE" (Kalem).

SAMUEL LOVER wrote many interesting tales of Ireland, not the least of which is "Rory O'More." This story was dramatized and in that form was probably Lover's most successful work, gaining a world-wide reputation for its author as a dramatist. Now it is to further contribute to his memory in motion picture form, for "Rory O'More" is the title of the first of this year's Kalem Irish pictures to be released.

A private view of this subject was accorded a representative of the Moving Picture World the other day and it is a pleasure to testify to the general excellence of the production. Photographically it approaches perfection to a degree that is unusual, and several pleasing and novel effects point to the photographer's skill and ingenuity.

In the matter of scenic effects it might be claimed that views quite as beautiful are to be found in America; but that would not be a just criticism of this picture. The purpose of the Kalem Company in sending its players to Ireland was to produce the Irish classics on Irish soil—amid the very surroundings about which they were written. Therefore, when we view the rugged hills and the wildly romantic river of the picture, we are looking upon the selfsame scenes in the south of Ireland of which Lover wrote. This charm of realism will have a strong appeal.

In the very first scene is shown a meeting between Rory and his sweetheart, Kathleen, upon the rocks about which a mountain torrent is tumbling wildly. At another time the lovers meet upon the rugged, rock strewn side of a mountain; mist dimmed hills form the background, while far below in the valley is the footpath along which may be seen the approach of the British soldiers in quest of the fugitive.

Another scene, which is most typical of the country, is shown in the illustration which accompanies this review. The Irish donkey hitched to its cart is still a familiar scene in the rural districts, especially in the hills where the donkey is about the only safe mode of locomotion. This and the thatched roof of the cottage are typically Irish and will awaken fond memories in many a loyal Irish heart.

A unique scene is that of the imprisonment of Rory, when after his capture he was locked in jail to await trial. Through the barred door the captors with their prisoner are seen approaching the jail; the door is opened and Rory is thrust in, the door closed and locked and the captors marching away. It is a weird photographic effect accomplished by placing the camera inside the jail.

For the story of the picture the reader is referred to the book and the play. Briefly, Rory, an adventuresome young Irishman of revolutionary tendencies, was arrested after much effort on the part of the British soldiers then policing the land, tried for treason, convicted and sentenced to be hung. He made a sensational escape and left the country for America, bringing his sweetheart and mother with him. These incidents are dramatically portrayed in the picture. Jack Clark impersonates Rory; Miss Gauntier is a charming Kathleen. As the militant priest, Arthur Donaldson gives a splendid characterization, and Robert Vignola is most vindictive as the informer. Among the more interesting scenes is that of the trial which is put on with great care for detail, and the execution scene when Rory is released by the priest and makes his escape over the wall just as the noose is about to be placed about his neck.

It will be interesting to many exhibitors to know that Samuel Lover, the author of the story and play from which this picture was taken, paid an extended visit to America in 1846, during which year he landed in Boston. His tour included nearly all of the then principal cities of the country, extending as far south as New Orleans. There are still living some who will recall the occasion and will be interested in the portrayal of his story.

ROMEO AND JULIET (Thanhouser, two reels).

THIS is the first attempt of an Independent manufacturer to produce a two-reel attraction. The subject was well chosen, for "age cannot wither nor custom stale" the deathless charm of Shakespeare. "Romeo and Juliet" has been rendered into moving pictures before, more than two years ago by the Vitagraph Company. The film of the Vitagraph Company possesses rare merit, but the present production has a great advantage—it has more space for the telling of the story, two thousand feet instead of only one thousand. Nothing could better illustrate the advantage of the two-reel over the one-reel film than a comparison between the productions of these two companies. The Vitagraph story was exceedingly well told, the acting was superb, the settings magnificent, the adaptation clever. The two reels production, however, makes the story plainer to a person who has never read the classic tragedy.

It is creditable to the maker of this present film that each of the reels tells a story of its own; one the love story, the other the tragedy. As the reels are issued at different times this will help the exhibitor. Some day it is to be hoped an arrangement will be made which allows of such productions being released at the same time—the only sensible and logical way.

The Thanhouser adaptation is the work of skilled and conscientious effort and makes the story very plain to every grade of intelligence, a merit which cannot be estimated too highly. All the classic figures in the play are well individualized, from Romeo and Juliet to the smallest character. This individualization extends to the matter of costumes as well; indeed, in this regard the present production leaves no room for adverse criticism. This is much to be lauded, for in a Shakespearian classic above all things, proper costuming is an essential part of the right atmosphere. The settings, especially the out-door scenes, are very happily chosen and arranged, and lend much charm to the production. Owing to the fact that the film maker had two reels in which to tell the story, he was able to give much space to the opening scenes, which make it so much easier to grasp and follow the story. The choosing of these scenes was dictated by art and good taste. Just praise must be given to the acting, which was well up to the general fine standard of the whole production.

"MY OLD DUTCH" (Vitagraph).

This is a most worthy film; story, acting and portraiture being of the very highest order. To merit the appreciation it most justly deserves it is very necessary that the subject be thoroughly understood or the great value of the picture is lost. "My Old Dutch" is the familiar yet kindly sobriquet given by the South of England costermonger to his wife, who is also very often his partner in his peddling business. While often of a very ordinary type of people, sometimes distinctly common, the characters in this instance are of those of that class of respectable traders who command respect; and of whom Albert Chevallier wrote, and upon whose poem this story is here reproduced.

Vault Scene from "Romeo and Juliet" (Thanhouser).

The costermonger and his wife, Bill and Mary Hawkins, are a kindly, good-looking, thrifty old couple who have taken in their well-kept home a young artist, Clive Huntley. Probably through lack of success and through privation, the artist is taken seriously ill and is tenderly nursed by the old couple, who treat him as a son. Never before have a series of more beautiful and interesting pictures of an elderly couple been seen; without doubt, the bedroom pictures are masterpieces, one or two scenes especially being worthy of depicting on canvas, so excellent are the groupings and effect, with likenesses that are perfect.

Scene from "My Old Dutch" (Vitagraph).

Mr. Van Dyke Brooke and Mrs. Mary Maurice are most perfectly at home, both in personal attributes and histrionic ability, in the characters they here assume.

Mr. Maurice Costello's portrayal of Clive Huntley is in harmony with his versatile adaptability. The varied changes of life under which the poor artist, through the death of a rich uncle, becomes not only a man of wealth, but also a man of title, lends a charm to the subject in that these changes enhance the nobility of his manhood. Suddenly visiting the old couple who had befriended him he finds them about to be despoiled of their home, having lost all their worldly possessions through the alluring schemes of cunning wild-cat mining agents. The truth of the old saying that "bread cast upon the waters returns after many days" is here beautifully exemplified. Huntley, now "Sir Clive," redeems the property of the old people and from the abundance of his wealth is able amply to repay their former kindness.

The story is a charming one, well told and well portrayed, producing the wish that all who see this film may be acquainted with its origin and purpose, lest they lose its full value. It is also another proof that there are upon the bookshelves of our libraries not only sufficient, but better subjects than are being produced in the name of more recent scenarios. "My Old Dutch" is Vitagraph's complement of "Auld Robin Gray"; there are still others of a similar noble character.

LYRIC EXCHANGE MOVES.

The Lyric Film & Supply Co., Independent exchange of Terre Haute, Ind., has moved to its new building at 27 South Sixth Street, between Wabash Ave. and Ohio Strect.

PICTURE MEN OBJECT.

Onerous Conditions of Proposed Regulations for Film Storage Pointed Out to Commission.

The adjourned meeting of the Municipal Explosives Commission of the City of New York to consider the proposed regulations for the manufacture, storage and handling of inflammable motion picture film was held at the Fire Department Building, 157 East 67th Strect, Thursday morning, August 10, at 10.30 o'clock. Members of the commission present were Gen. George O. Eaton, Chairman; Sidney Harris, Peter Acritelli, and R. S. Lundy, secretary. D. I. Kelly, Chief of the Bureau of Combustibles, was also present.

A. B. Graham, attorney, was the principal spokesman for the Independent interests. Picture men present were J. A. Brulatour and Herbert L. Miles, of the Motion Picturc Distributing and Sales Company; P. A. Powers, of Powers Motion Picture Company; Mark Dittenfass, of the Champion Company; H. J. Streyckmans, of the New York Motion Picture Company; C. A. Willat and Julius Sterne, of the Imp Company; G. A. Magie, of the Solax Company; E. Offeman and Harry Raver, of the American Eclair Company; Paul Hernoud, of Lux; J. H. Dreher, of the International Film Trading Company. The Motion Picture Patents Company was represented by Attorney Church.

While a general objection was entered against the entire proposition of the Commission, the principal discussion was upon Section 4, which provides as follows:

Sec. 4. No permit for the storage of inflammable motion picture films shall be issued for any building which does not contain one or more separate compartments for the storage of such films. Each compartment shall not exceed one thousand cubic feet in space area, and shall be constructed upon suitable foundations, having no opening except the door leading into the building, and having the walls, floor and roof constructed of Portland cement concrete at least six inches thick, or brick masonry at least eight inches thick. The bricks to be laid in and covered by Portland cement mortar.

The drastic nature of this section was pointed out to the members of the Commission, and it was suggested that a substitute for concrete might be found in a sheet steel lining for storage rooms, or that fireproof storage safes, such as now in use by many exchanges might answer the purpose and satisfy the requirements of the Commission.

Sections 5, 6, 7 and 8 depended upon the form of Section 4 and came in for the same objections. To the other sections of the proposed regulations little objection was made.

Offer was freely made by the picture men to furnish the Commission with every facility to acquaint themselves with the manner of handling film and the Commissioners were invited to inspect the film exchanges.

The hearing was concluded at 12.30 o'clock, when Chairman Eaton requested those present who desired to do so to make statements in writing as to the manner in which proper safeguards should be installed. One week was given in which to file these statements.

CONVENTION DAFFYDILS.

Rainy weather did not dampen the enthusiasm of the delegates.

If Herbert L. was the oldest exhibitor there, the lady who passed as Mrs. Miles must have been his granddaughter.

It was a wily chap who represented the "Sunlight" curtain.

The Novelty Slide Co., of New York did not intend their exhibit as souvenirs, but if each one that "disappeared" results in an order they will have at least two dozen new customers.

The Simplex machine did not arrive until the last day, but when it did Frank Cannock lost no time in setting it up right in front of President Neff's desk and the exhibitors would hear no call to order until they had examined this wonderful piece of mechanism.

Too bad Rock did not insist that Independent and Licensed films be exhibited together. The Vitagraph Western reel, "Man to Man," would have been an object lesson to some folks.

You never saw a more sociable group of business antagonists than the machine representatives and they never failed to drown each other's sorrow each time that the doors of the hall closed for secret session and left them on the outside.

Frank can knock, but he does not need to. His machine, the Simplex, speaks for itself sufficiently well.

The decorations behind the bar in Weber's were particularly attractive to the representatives of the Red Rooster. At all events they included an excellent copy of the Pathe trademark. Linn says he was very well behaved so we must believe him.

TURNER IN TOWN.

J. T. Turner, of the firm of Turner & Dahnken, Licensed exchange, San Francisco, Cal., is spending his vacation in New York, making his temporary abode at the New Grand Hotel, Broadway and 31st Street. He is accompanied by Mrs. Turner and his two pretty little daughters.

CHICAGO LETTER.

By Jas. S. McQuade.

J. T. TURNER, vice-president and treasurer of the licensed Exchange of Turner & Dahnken, Inc., San Francisco, spent several days in Chicago the week of July 29th. He was accompanied by Mrs. Turner and two children on the vacation trip across the continent, New York being the next stopping point.

Mr. Turner informed me that his firm has rented the licensed product since the formation of the Motion Picture Patents Company, and that during that period he has observed the great forward strides made by picture entertainment in his home city. The small store theater is being succeeded steadily by modern houses of greater capacity. Men of large means, keen business sense and alert enterprise are engaging in the exhibition of pictures. Indeed, he believes that the successful exhibitor of to-day must have especially the showman's instinct, as well as the other qualifications mentioned.

With the competition of more commodious houses and the high operating expenses, not to speak of heavy rents, the small theater owner is being forced out, unless he has contrived to save enough to build an up-to-date structure. Mr. Turner believes, however, that the small houses, in some instances, will be able to exist by offering a program at five cents, while the larger houses will charge ten cents or more.

Picture Theaters in San Francisco.

Of the 83 theaters in San Francisco at present using pictures, about 40 of the number use pictures only. The remainder employ cheap, or high class, vaudeville acts in addition. The average seating capacity of the straight picture theaters is about 400.

All the picture theaters of San Francisco are well lighted during exhibition hours, Mr. Turner assured me, and greater importance is being attached to projection. Many houses are laying stress on playing the pictures properly, and some managers have orchestra rehearsals for each subject on the program, similar to those for the acts on a vaudeville bill.

Turner & Dahnken are now having a new theater built for them in Oakland. The house will be completed within 90 days and will be taken over by them on a long lease. It will seat 1,700 people and the intention is to devote it strictly to pictures. High class singing numbers will be used in connection. Another new house will be opened by them in Berkeley, about August 15th. It will seat 1,000 people.

Kinemacolor Draws Well at Garrick.

Kinemacolor pictures of the coronation of George V, produced under the Urban-Smith patents, were exhibited for the first time in Chicago, at the Garrick Theater, Saturday evening, July 29, and not on Thursday, July 27, as at first announced, the delay being due to house renovation. The attendance taxed the capacity. At the close of the week the house management stated that the receipts exceeded those of Lyman H. Howe, for the first week of his successful run at the same theater.

The exhibition was supported by a capable orchestra, and a lecturer explained the various scenes, but his voice was pitched in such low tones that his remarks were inaudible to those in the back seats. Simple sound effects were also employed.

In a general sense the production afforded a splendid series of spectacles and pageants amid a sea of glowing natural colors, the effect being impressively rich and picturesque. The colors of the uniforms and decorations were happily adapted to kinemacolr, red being predominent. The scene showing the Indian troops in camp offered a delightful variety of colors. Here, too, one could observe a clearer definition of the features of the men and officers than was offered in the more imposing pageants.

The coronation drill at Reedham was one of the prettiest and most effective spots in the entire program, if one excepts the splendid and majestic naval review at Spithead. This great marine spectacle was perfectly reproduced, from the changing hues of the clouds to the flecked surface of green, through which the royal yacht and the monster war vessels cut their foam-lapped furrows.

Bursts of applause frequently greeted the effective scenes during the exhibition on the opening night, but there was a feeling of being overfed at one sitting. An hour and a half is quite long enough for any picture program, whether it be kinemacolor or black and white.

Picture Theaters and Curtains.

It is now over two years since the lighting of picture theaters while pictures were being run was deemed a necessity. The dark house fostered evils which the conscientious manager realized must be overcome. An impetus was given to the abolishment of the dark house by the adverse criticisms of a hostile press and by the bitter opposition of moral purists, who could see nothing but evil in the picture theater under any circumstances.

Gradually it was discovered that a system of lighting could be installed that would permit the projection of a clear and well defined picture and, at the same time, enable anyone seated in the auditorium to read a newspaper without great straining of the eyes. An important requirement of the several systems adopted throughout the country was that the subdued light should not strike the eyes of the spectators, but be directed to the floor by means of deep opaque shades, hung downwards, the lights being fixed on the side walls, up to a certain distance from the screen. The reflected light system, from the ceiling, has not been found so satisfactory as the side wall system.

The lighted theater naturally directed more careful thought and attention to projection and the curtain. Granting that the operator was master of the equipment in the booth, the exhibitor recognized the value of having a material and surface that would bring out, with best effect, all the photographic merits of the film. He was not alone in this conclusion, as enterprising supply firms soon appeared in the market with curtain coatings of various kinds, mirror screens, metallic screens, metallic cloth screens, etc., each being strongly recommended by the manufacturer. Some of these, especially the coating, or "smear," have been found wanting in permanent qualities. Time will soon eliminate the unfit, and just as surely will it lead to the adoption of the most perfect substitute for the old muslin or linen curtain.

Men of long experience in the film business, in all its branches, and expert in their views, without prejudice against any of the present devices, are in favor of a white vertical wall, of uniform surface, for the projection of pictures. This background brings out softly the half tones of the picture, which, they claim, are destroyed by screens of any kind, more or less. Moreover, they hold that the eye does not tire while viewing pictures on such a background, a something that is likely to happen with certain screens.

The Sunlight metallic cloth curtain is commended as assisting materially in the projection of a well defined soft picture.

Chicago Film Brevities.

John T. Rock, Western representative of the Vitagraph Company, was a conspicuous member of the Chicago contingent that visited the national convention of exhibitors at Cleveland.

E. H. Bishop, director of several film and manufacturing firms, in London, Eng., was a visitor in the city last week. He left at the close of the week for a tour of the Pacific coast.

Douglas Cooper, general representative of the General Film Company in Canada, and formerly Montreal manager of the Kleine Optical Company, was in the city, Monday, July 31, and returned home the same evening.

N. E. Chaney, owner of the Orpheum Theater, Hillsboro, Ohio, is a live advertiser, in his home papers, judging from copies received from the Cincinnati branch of the General Film Company, from which he gets his service. Attractive displays and numerous paragraphs throughout the local news columns can be found in every issue.

Thos. Ricketts, at one time producer of the Essanay's Eastern Stock Company, and afterwards with the American Film Manufacturing Company, is now producer for the Nestor Company, of New York. Numerous friends of Mr. Ricketts will be glad to learn that he is doing well.

W. J. West, owner of the Majestic Theater, Kewanee, Ill., was a visitor at the office of The World last week, while on his way to spend a vacation at Tampa, Fla. The Majestic has been running three years, and during that time has showed to successful business. Mr. West considers his house the coziest and prettiest to be found anywhere. It seats 350 people and can number the best residents of Kewanee among its patrons. Sidney Smith books the programs. Mr. West stated that he has had exceptionally fine business all through the summer, which he attributes to the fact that mothers and fathers have absolute confidence in the cleanness of the show, and are always certain of a fine program. Mr. West also attributes his summer's success, in part, to the clever singing talent employed. He also boasts of a fine three-piece orchestra, with Tracy Holbrook, violinist, as leader. Mr. West is also proud of the fact that his programs are generally commended by all his patrons and by traveling men who stop over in the city, for the fine quality of the pictures.

Arthur J. Hill will have his new house, the Glen, ready for opening on September 1. The Glen, which is situated on Armitage Avenue and Francisco Street, cost $15,000. Its capacity is 300. H. A. Hill, son of the owner, will manage the house. At present he is managing the Arrow Theater, at 1438 Fullerton Avenue.

The Central Theater, a new house that will seat 300 people, has been erected by Mrs. Wilhelmina Trebbin, on Fullerton Avenue near Drake Avenue. It was opened Saturday, July 22, to good business. Service is being furnished by the Standard Film Company.

The Playhouse, a new theater built by Mrs. C. E. Cook, at 1846 West Madison Street, at a cost of $16,000, will be opened Friday or Saturday, August 11 or 12. Mrs. Cook formerly owned the old Playhouse, at 1859 West Madison Street, which was torn down owing to the lapse of the lease. The new theater is thoroughly fireproof and has a beautiful marble front, with pretty interior decorations. The floor is of concrete and the seats of comfortable, modern type. The house will seat 454 people. Mrs. Cook will manage the theater.

Dunmeyer Bros., owners of the Crystal Theater, Muncie, Ind., were in the city last week, They have established a new Crystal, in a modern building just completed, which will have twice the seating capacity of the old. While in the city, the Dunmeyer Bros. purchased an electrical piano, which cost $1,500, for the new house. The old Crystal will be used as a store.

C. J. Grim, of Gibson City, Ill., opened his new house, the New Fashioned Theater, on Saturday, August 5. The house will seat 250 people.

R. H. Griffith of the Star Theater, Belvidere, Ill., visited the city last week and arranged for service with the G. F. Co.'s office at 117 N. Dearborn Street.

Robert Lieber, owner of the Lieber Exchange, Indianapolis, was in the city Wednesday, August 2, and called on a number of his old friends in film circles. Mr. Lieber reported a steady increase in his business for the last three weeks.

The Bridgeport Theater, at 28th Street and Archer Avenue, was opened Thursday, July 20. It is owned by E. Kounosky. It seats 300 people. The Bridgeport is an old theater remodeled, and has been showing to an increasing business daily since it was opened. Mr. Kounosky also owns the 51st Street Theater. 51st Street and Ashland Avenue. Both theaters are supplied with service by the G. F. Co.'s office at 17-19 S. Wabash Avenue.

The Majestic Theater Company, of Sheboygan, Wis., opened their new house, the Majestic, on August 1. It was built especially for the pictures, at an outlay of $15,000.

Maurice Fleckles, manager of the Laemmle Exchange, this city, was seen on his return from the national convention of exhibitors at Cleveland, and spoke highly of the meeting and attendance.

R. Miller, of the Globe Film Service Co., this city, was interviewed last week and reported that business was a little dull. He, however, looks forward hopefully to fine business on or about September 1, when most of the theaters now closed will be opened.

A handsome new catalogue has just been issued for the Edengraph machine. It is finely illustrated. A valuable feature of the publication is that all the various parts of the machine and their prices are carefully tabulated for ready reference. The catalogue will be forwarded to any address on application. J. S. M.

Peerless Theater is a little store show, at Milwaukee and Ashland avenues. It has a fairly good-looking front, but the interior is disappointing. Four reels of licensed films were shown, the first three so slowly that the flicker was painful, and the last so hurried that jump and vibration ruined the effect. The films were not in very good condition, lacking titles and rainy. Two machines and operators were employed, but neither operator could maintain a good even light. One thing, however, can be commended here: the screen is elevated above the floor level about seven feet, and it is pure white.

Iola Theater is the only independent theater in the neighborhood, and though it is situated on the second floor at the extreme rear of the house, its 600 seats were nearly all filled. Projection is very good; light well handled and steady, and bright, even though the picture is not at all small. The operator is evidently a very careful man, and showed it when he ran two sets of song slides through. In some of the scenes he interposed a tint slide of green or orange in front of the lens, making a very pretty effect. Contrary to what may be expected, the definition of the screen image is not impaired by this, and not all the colors are killed, though much subdued.

Fairyland Theater is one of the oldest shows on the avenue, and is very prettily decorated. It is owned by the same people as the Lyric, and both houses were built by the Decorators' Supply Company, in whose catalogue pictures of both places may be seen. The Fairyland is on the second floor, and has its screen at the street end of the house. The projection is excellent, and the pianist fairly made the Vitagraph "A Geranium" talk, with soft appropriate music. The exit of the Fairyland is at the rear of the house, and passing out one goes through a penny arcade and shooting gallery.

C. YOUNG.

With The Western Producers.

Both Selig companies have returned; the one from the Santa Cruz Islands and the other from the Yosemite Valley. The negatives of the pictures taken are being developed and will soon be on the way to the Chicago office. The Santa Cruz company, soon after returning, took a trip to San Pedro under the supervision of Francis Boggs, where they took scenes to be used in connection with the Santa Cruz stories. Following the trip, a number of interior scenes were taken at the studio which are also to be used with the Santa Cruz pictures. The company which returned from the Yosemite were also kept busy in order to obtain interior scenes for the negatives. Now that both companies are in Los Angeles and there is no plan on hand of sending one away, the local company finds itself in a position where it has too many actors on hand. That something will have to be done is understood. Probably there will be a few members less who will claim connection with the Selig Polyscope Company.

Fate, which seems to have had it in for the Selig Company for the past few months, appears to be resting at present with regard to the Selig members. Mr. McGee has entirely recovered from his recent illness and Fred Huntley, with the exception of a badly blistered lip, the remains of his recent fever at Santa Barbara, is as well as ever. Miss Iva Shepard, who narrowly escaped having one of her limbs amputated, is able to walk about and will soon be working. Miss Besserer, who broke her leg when thrown from a horse, is improving. The plaster cast has been removed from her injured limb.

Mr. Phillbrook will soon move into his new bungalow in Edendale, which is completed with the exception of painting. A garage is also being built.

The Bison Company, who are at present in Bear Valley, report that they are getting some excellent scenes which will make their Indian pictures a hit. Local exhibitors are looking forward to the Bear Valley releases and are confident that their themes will be something out of the ordinary. This is by reason of the fact that Richard V. Spencer, formerly Los Angeles correspondent for the Moving Picture World, has joined the company as scenario editor. He has written more than fifty successful scenarios during the past eight months, so local exhibitors know what to expect. While correspondent for the World Mr. Spencer made many friends.

The Pathe West Coast Company will leave for Catalina Island about the beginning of August. It will remain there about a week, during which time exterior scenes will be taken to be used in Indian pictures. Canoes will play an important part in these pictures and for that reason a number of canoes will be carried along.

Charles French and Miss Hazel Buckham, both of the Pathe Company, were almost drowned recently at a local park when the canoe in which they were, accidentally turned over. Other members of the company went to the rescue and they were promptly pulled out. Miss Buckham was unconscious when brought ashore but was soon revived with the aid of stimulants. Both members are unable to swim.

A report has reached here that a new motion picture company under the name of the Portland Lifeograph Company has just started in Portland. Educational pictures are said to be the feature at present, and a studio is declared to be under construction which will enable it to enter the field in all subjects.

Technique of the Photoplay

Chapter V.
PLANNING THE PHOTOPLAY.

IN the preceding chapters the technique of the photoplay has been exposed, but technique is merely the adroit use of the tools of the craft. The sculptor's assistant may be a better hewer of marble than his master, but it is the artist mind that conceives the idea, that gives beauty to form. Inspiration is the soul, technique the flesh and bones.

The technically perfect photoplay commands the respect that is always the due of painstaking labor, but the idea, rough hewn, but virile and vivid, is more to be desired than the stale theme perfectly developed. Technique will enable you to exhibit your ideas to the fullest advantage, to convey your thoughts most intelligibly to another, but it is the idea that the editor seeks and the original idea stands a better chance of acceptance than a theme hackneyed but partly redeemed by treatment.

Plots That Are Not Wanted.

As has been explained, adaptations of books or other standard or modern literature are not desired because the editor can get the idea from the same source and supply the technique himself. Better still, he is in possession of complete knowledge of the resources and limitations of his plant and may write more understandingly.

Complicated plots are not wanted because they are not easily to be followed through their many ramifications.

Stories of murders, thefts, abduction and all crimes are not wanted unless the moral is strong and rightly placed. These stories require such careful treatment that they should not be attempted until experience has been gained. It is well to keep away from them entirely if other ideas can be found.

Stories based upon racial traits, malformations, differences in political or religious creeds, or anything reflecting upon a people, class, sect, creed, deformity, affliction, or the differences between capital and labor are not wanted. The photoplay appeals to all classes and peoples, and it is the aim of the manufacturer to avoid offense.

Stories in which evil eventually triumps over good are undesirable, as are those which are gruesome, unpleasant or sordid.

Children and Dogs Are Troublesome.

Few companies offer stories in which animals appear, because animals are hard to handle in the studio and a hundred feet of film may be wasted for every foot shown on the screen. Animals may be introduced to good effect in some pictures, but they should be required to perform specific tricks unless you are writing on order to fit the tricks that have been taught.

For much the same reason children should not be employed to any marked extent, although their simple introduction into the scene is effective. If the wronged wife is driven into the cold streets you are sorry for her, but if she has two small children with her, sympathy is more than doubled. Some companies boast exceptionally clever children. In such case stories may be submitted in which the burden of the work falls on the child, but should the story fail at its first point of call there are few other places to which it may be sent.

This applies to all stories written to fit certain types. If you are planning to appeal to some well-defined personality and fail, the story has to be rewritten before it may be certain of a welcome elsewhere.

Do not plan stories in which some central figure or figures run through a series of adventures in many reels. This type is popular in Europe, but stories in series are not liked here, although a number of distinct stories may be written around the personality of some favorite player. Unless you are in close touch with the editor for that studio do not try these, and in no event offer a series of your own initiative.

Doubtless you have seen stories filmed which violate the rules laid down above. This does not mean that these stories are in demand. They are likely to prove the exception to the rule, to be accounted for by some peculiar studio condition.

What a Good Story Is.

What is wanted by the editor is originality of thought, a strong, clean story, simply planned to avoid complications beyond the grasp of the average spectator and possessed of the indefinable something that for want of a definite term is called heart interest. Clean, clear, clever, concise.

It would seem that every beginner has to write stories on certain themes, and editors have come to expect these in every batch of stories. Some of these are cited below. Unless you can give some startling twist of novelty to these time-worn devices do not attempt to send them out. Wait until you have passed that period. These are the most frequent:

The discharged workman who plans to be revenged upon his employer for his fancied wrong, but who either saves the employer's child from abduction, his money from theft, or his house from arson, thereby obtaining reinstatement and an increase in salary.

The child who reunites parted parents or prevents a separation.

The child who reunites parents and children separated through an unapproved marriage.

The child who redeems the criminal or who saves the discouraged from the downward plunge.

The employee who gets an interest in the business, and his employer's daughter, either with or without opposition from the foreman or the junior partner.

The bad small boy.

These plots were the stock in trade of the director when the photoplay was first developed. They have been done to death and each company has one or more versions of each to work over at will when ideas grow scarce.

Working Out the Plot.

The simple plot, provided that it is not old, stands the best chance of acceptance. The more direct the recital of events the more probable is it acceptance, other things being equal. What is wanted is a story that will be intelligible to the patrons of the cheaper houses while it is also of interest to the photo-playgoers of a higher order of intelligence.

Sometimes it is the climax of a story which first suggests itself, but more often the plot starts with the main incident from which the developments are made. More than one dramatic work has been evolved from the "big scene," and more than one photoplay has worked backward from its climax, but while the inspiration may come from either end of the plot, the work should be started from the leading incident; the happening which starts the action and which gives rise to all the other situations.

Many, if not most, beginners make the mistake of supposing that there is but a single logical sequence of events to be deduced from a given happening. This is a grave error. A dozen utterly dissimilar plays may find their origin in a single situation.

A man standing where two avenues meet may take either path. He may proceed directly or he may turn off at any intersecting street. It is the same with a plot. The painstaking playwright will explore both avenues and all side streets before he decides upon the route his hero travels. It may be that he will find many pleasant ways over which other heroes or heroines may be sent with profit. Before you begin to write, look at your plot from all angles.

Sources of Inspiration.

Sometimes a fiction story may suggest a plot. Not the plot of the story, but some other chain of happenings. Even a chance phrase or paragraph may give birth to a new plot; perhaps it is something that the author has left out.

The newspapers teem with hints, the streets are full of suggestions, even produced photoplays will give rise to others; nothing is devoid of suggestion to those who see with the eyes of the mind. Instead of looking at what has been done look for what has been left undone. One successful short story writer confesses that half of his plots are the result of watching for the omissions of other writers.

No two minds observe a happening from precisely the same point of view, and the ten-dollar story of the novice may suggest another style of treatment to the trained writer that results in a hundred-dollar story, utterly unlike the other, yet derived from it. The author merely has done what he thinks the other author should have done.

To sit at the desk and deliberately plan the details of plot is a gift that comes only with training, but it is easy to train the mind to observe unimportant facts that give rise to important plots. One dainty love story found its birth in the unimportant trifle of a sheet blown from a window where it was sunning with other bedding. The sheet became a silk couch cover that blew into another window, bringing charges of theft and an apology that became an avowal of love.

The commonplace suggestions are best, but do not leave them commonplace. A girl drops her handkerchief and a man picks it up, opening an acquaintance that develops into matrimony. That story has been done. Suppose that he is running to catch a train, and not seeing the girl for the crowd, puts the dainty cambric into his pocket. On the train he discovers an odd token tied into one corner. Through the token he traces the girl, restores the token and wins her heart, the story hinging on the quest of the girl, the story has been lifted from the commonplace.

These two incidents should give the thoughtful reader the guide to other developments.

Centering the Interest.

A common error divides the interest of the plot between two or more persons. At first glance it would appear that the hero and heroine should share the interest jointly, but a more careful survey of the subject will prove the fallacy of the argument. Select one character and make all of the situations subordinate to that personality. Do not let the interest waver for a moment or you are liable to find the interest shifted to some other character.

To take the most familiar form, suppose that we have the familiar triangle of two men and a girl. If you attempt to divide the interest between the three you weaken the whole. One of the two men is doomed to disappointment, and if your interest in him is equal to your interest in the winner, his failure detracts from your satisfaction in the success of the other.

Select one of the two men and make the audience so vitally interested in him that they want him to win and regard the second man almost in the light of the villain; not because of his evil deeds, but merely because you want your man to win. If you select the girl, show that she wants one of the two men and make the audience fear that the other fellow will get her. Keep the spectator guessing until the last moment and his satisfaction in the result is the greater because of the suspense. If you let the man share interest with the girl your interest is divided and the audience is not so eager in spite of their greater interest in one of the two men.

Shifted Interest May Spoil the Plot.

Not long ago a triangle story was utterly spoiled because in the last ten feet of the film, the last ten seconds, the third man became such a pathetic figure that the sympathy shifted to him and the hero's success and the heroine's happiness were regretted.

Another common example is the Sheriff in the Western stories who finds the murderer he is hunting to be the man who previously has saved his life. If he permits the prisoner to escape he is foresworn. If he arrests him he is ungrateful. Even the spectator who does not reason this out is subconsciously aware of the fact that the story is not quite "right." There is something not quite satisfactory.

Determine beforehand upon the leading character and never let the interest get away from that person. Even a momentary lapse may prove fatal. In the model scenario you will find that both the girl and her brother are subsidiary to the character of Dick even though he does not appear in many scenes.

Start Your Interest in the First Scene.

Unless a preparatory scene is essential, plunge right into the unfolding of the plot, not abruptly but with ever increasing interest until the climax is reached. Do not go back to pick up dropped events. If your story moves along two paths toward a common goal, parallel the scenes. Some companies affect these double stories, usually those which afford contrasts between the rich and the poor, the happy and the unhappy, or the right and the wrong, but it is better to hold only one thread of interest and follow that without pause.

A story starting in the past and brought down to the present day is to be avoided. Lapse of time requires dual make-ups and confuses the identity when the break comes. Do not start with your heroine a little child and stick to her until she lands in some Home for Old Ladies, as one author sought to do, all within twenty minutes. Have all the events happen within a reasonably short space of time and leave the other sort to someone else.

As pointed out, your story should have a good moral tone, but it need not be a preachment to effect this result. Make your people normal; men and women of flesh and blood; have them do the things which are right, and let the moral care for itself. It is well to keep to the present day and to keep away from the slums and high society. Keep your action in one country instead of asking the director to take his people to Europe or Africa for a few scenes. Avoid the pig and the blackguard, the wanton and the woman of the streets. Be clean and original, and you will find success.

Victoria Theater, Harrisburg, Pa.

One of Harrisburg's finest picture theaters, the Victoria, on Market Street, Harrisburg, Pa., designed, built and managed by James George, is shown in the accompanying photograph. It has a frontage of 24 feet and is 250 feet deep, which dimensions, with the gallery, gives a seating capacity of 900. The lobby is finished in Italian marble with ticket booth to correspond. Passing through the entrance is the foyer or interior lobby, handsomely decorated, from which stairs extend on both sides to the gallery seats. There is a drinking fountain in the center of this lobby, and men's and women's retiring rooms on either side with attendants in charge. The chairs are of the best pattern, upholstered in leather, with racks for coats and hats. The picture is projected 125 feet on a Mirror screen, two Powers No. 6 machines being used, giving a clear and sharp picture 16 by 20 feet.

A continuous exhibition is given from 10 o'clock a. m. to 11 o'clock p. m., Independent first-run pictures being shown. The ushers are clad in white uniforms and are most attentive to the patrons of the house. Close examination of the engraving shows a picture house on either side of the Victoria. These are the Photoplay and Lyric theaters, which make the competition very strong.

Education and Science

A SCHOOL FOR VICE AND CRIME.

All noble minds interested in the photoplay have been glad to think, at least, if not to feel sure, that the days for violent strictures upon the moving pictures were passed. At this late date, however, Mr. William A. Pinkerton, of detective fame, says:

"Good moving pictures are all right; they educate, but the pictures depicting holdups and burglaries are making criminals of young men in this country. Something ought to be done to stop the showing of such pictures."

The writer felt sore upon reading these words, and wondered if they were not uncalled for; a recent experience, however, has taught him otherwise. Visiting one of the many ordinary "shows" recently, there appeared "The Ever Accuser," a story of a young man poisoning his uncle, to obtain his inheritance which had been willed to him, but for which he could not wait because of his fast life in company with a woman of ill repute. The whole story is unblushingly told, no hints, nothing left to the imagination; every detail is given with brutal frankness. The very poison is mixed in public; a nurse is made the innocent perpetrator of the crime with a viciousness that is revolting. The ghost of the murdered uncle is the "ever accuser," driving the young man to a confession of his guilt. Was this picture censored? It was not shown as such. Do these pictures pay? Yes, in evil returns. People of common taste and avearge culture will not pay a second visit to places where they are shown, and furthermore they note the names of the makers, to give their productions a "wide berth" in the future. Another unsavory picture seen at the same time and place is "A Gentleman Fireman." This is classed as a "French comedy." Well, it may be so! but if the taking a man's wife to accomplish her ruin is fun in France, it should be known that it is vice and a crime in America. To say that this is not a picture for children is to beg the question; no decent couple, engaged or married, can look upon such a picture as this without feeling their moral sensibilities insulted and reduced to the extent that after spending an evening in the company of such plays as these here described, one goes away feeling depressed and debased. For some minds these disgraceful scenes may be food, the feeding upon which produces just such characters that Detective Pinkerton says are here quickened into action. An admirer of all that is best in moving pictures, the writer would prove recreant to his ideals—and the ideals of a pure public—if he did not place upon record these experiences, and by so doing locate the blame for vicious pictures in the right place.

Only in the last issue of the Moving Picture World, in an article on "The Film Makers' Responsibilities," was the subject of the nature and refinement of American womanhood referred to. "Everything at which the better nature of man revolts should be avoided" is good advice, and unless this advice be taken the producers of obnoxious films must be prepared for the strictures their productions demand. The public and the makers of good films join in common accord in protest against that which causes reflections to be cast upon the excellent work otherwise being done by moving pictures.

WOMAN EDUCATOR ON MOVING PICTURES.

Interesting View of a Former Member of Board of Censors.

Mrs. R. G. Dolese, a former member of the Board of Censors and an educator of some note, like many other intelligent and progressive women, is a stanch friend of the moving picture and a thorough believer in its possibilities. To a representative of the Moving Picture World, Mrs. Dolese said among other things:

"I have been interested in educational work for many years and believe that the moving picture is the coming textbook of the schools. There is still, I am sorry to say, a great deal of ignorance among people of culture and refinement regarding the moving picture. I gave a moving picture entertainment for a ladies' club in one of the most prominent hotels in the city and found that many of the ladies knew practically nothing about moving pictures. Many of them had never seen a moving picture before. Others thought that moving pictures were shown only in the slums among dirty people in houses with poor ventilation. I get about a good deal, but see no such houses anywhere. The proprietors of almost all the places are anxious for the elevation of moving pictures as anyone can be. I think all the pictures are getting better, both the Independent and the Licensed ones. I am constantly getting calls for good educational pictures and educational exhibitions. These calls come from every part of the country. I think everybody loves moving pictures."

Of her work on the Board of Censorship, Mrs. Dolese declared that a conscientious discharge of duty meant a lot of work and careful consideration. Mrs. Dolese promised in the near future to contribute articles of an interesting nature and educational value to the Moving Picture World.

THE MORAL INFLUENCE OF THE PICTURE.

If anyone doubts the moral influence of moving pictures, let them study this great social and moral problem at close range. Without doubt there are many places, circumstances, and conditions, where the question could be tested. In New York and all great cities it is an accepted fact, that the great number of low music halls, dancing and drinking places, and especially those of the vulgar and immoral "Café Chantaut" variety have been largely superseded by moving picture places of ever-increasing improvement in both quality and tone. Nowhere is this more noticeable than in Coney Island, and nowhere can there be a better standard of a perfect test. Upwards of forty places which were formerly classed as breeders of an immoral taint, causing trouble to moral agencies and the legal authorities, now no longer exist.

A social or moral crusade, or the violent expulsion by the enactment of stringent laws, could not as effectively have abolished these places as the incoming pictures have succeeded in doing. Further to this, it must be added that the class of exhibitions are constantly improving, the best machines, screens, pictures and operators are in demand; a healthy competitive rivalry is proving effectual in perfecting the moral tone, so that there is every proof of the great value of the moving picture as an uplifting moral influence.

WHY DELAY?

The reputation of the moving picture as an educational factor is far ahead of its real character and ability. It is greatly to the credit of cinematography that there is such a world-wide demand for its wonderful uses; it is greatly to its discredit that it cannot respond to the demands made upon it.

That this discredit is not altogether an adverse reflection must be admitted; claim must be made, however, that there is not a sufficient realization of the valuable loss of time and opportunity which is being caused by so slow a response to the public demand.

In all delays there is either a legitimate cause or a blameable responsibility. In the present instance there seems to be a little of each; while the moving picture is growing mature in itself, it is still very young in educational departmental work. The necessity of accumulating wealth seems essential to the building of character, hence it appears that the moving picture must become powerful before it can become demonstrative and useful. Care must be taken, however, that no delay be traceable to dilatory or unworthy causes, a whole generation of young people is losing much valuable time which could be profitably employed if all demands were met. Sufficient progress has been made in all branches of moving picture work to secure efficient results; application of these results is alone desirable to perfect arrangements for general educational purposes; may they be speedily forthcoming; why delay?

Senator Gallinger, of Lewiston, Me., is trying to introduce a bill into the United States Senate at Washington, D. C., prohibiting the exhibition of moving pictures such as manhunts, prison escapes, burglaries and similar felonies.

Observations by our Man About Town

The present season has been the most remarkable of any in the history of the motion picture business in Greater New York. There has never been a more unsatisfactory one from the standpoint of the exhibitor. Both the indoor and outdoor exhibitors have suffered through the unusual weather conditions. The stretches of hot weather scorched the box offices of the former and the alternating torrents of rain have dampened the hopes of the open air men. It is agreed that in the share of hard luck they break about even. I have failed to find a place showing a profit thus far for this season, and I am forced to admit that the exhibitors claiming to have met with losses are not misrepresenting conditions. Everybody is hoping that, for the balance of the season, weather conditions will be more favorable and the exhibitors may get a chance to make some profit, or at least break even. Most of the rain storms have loomed up at a time when the managers could least withstand the effects. They have come at an hour when sufficient time was not allowed to get the seats dry for the night show. Many managers had gangs at work drying the seats after the rain stopped, but the patrons who appreciated these efforts were few in proportion to the regular number of attendants.

I visited one open air place last week after a rain storm. It was about seven o'clock in the evening. About two hours earlier I had met the manager of the place. The rain fell in torrents. I sympathized with the exhibitor, but he was full of spunk and told me that if the rain stopped falling before the hour arrived for the opening of the gates of his place he would give a show. His program was that good old-timer "Uncle Tom's Cabin." Shortly before seven o'clock the rain ceased and, as I was in the vicinity of the place, I hastened to the park to see if the manager was serious in making the declaration that his show would go on. When I reached the park a dozen or more boys and young men were drying the seats with cloths, and but a few minutes after the regular time for opening the gates the ticket seller was on duty. The attendance at the first show was light, but for the second show there was a surprisingly large audience, chiefly made up of women and children. Would you believe it? At least fifty per cent. of the women carried with them newspapers which they placed upon the seats. Can you beat that? Was it "Uncle Tom" or the "picture bug" that brought about the result?

During my jaunts about town the past week I visited the offices of several makers of moving pictures and learned that reports received from various parts of the States show that the exhibiting business is very slow. The various film exchanges report that there are no indications of immediate improvement, but a very gratifying fall and winter business is promised. In many quarters the middle of August is depended upon to bring about an improving turn. Money predict that a large number of indoor places will start to do business again before the end of August, which will be considerably in advance of the movement in that direction of previous years. I was shown letters from a number of film exchange managers in which they stated that they expected a very favorable change by the first week of September. In preceding years October has been looked upon as the pivotal period. Most of the enthusiasts incline to the belief that weather conditions for the balance of the summer will favor the towns and cities more than the country and seaside resorts, and consequently bring about the reopening of the winter houses much earlier than usual.

A correspondent to one of the daily newspapers contributes some very good arguments in behalf of moving picture places. He says the streets are full of children and mischievous boys who could very profitably spend their time in such places. He makes a plea that more five-cent moving picture places be provided, as the poor cannot afford to patronize the ten-cent places. This matter has been the subject of much discussion for some itme and the ten-cent theater is gradually gaining in the favor. The people who control the theaters realize that at five cents they could get larger audiences in many localities, but experience has shown the admission fee is too far below the profit-making basis in these days. In the case of ordinary store shows conditions have so changed that few five cent places can be made to show expenses. The proprietors can no longer live over the show stores, nor can they rent the apartments to others and scores of them have found that, no matter how poor the residents of the locality may be, the ten-cent place will get the patronage if the attraction is proportionately superior to that offered by the nickel place.

In my opinion, the five-cent theater is doomed to extinction, but it is quite possible that galleries may be provided for those who are too poor to pay more, especially in cases where poor families desire to attend picture shows. Many picture houses now have three prices—balcony, orchestra and boxes. The prices are no less than ten cents, however. A manager of one of the places told me he would not think of making the balcony less than ten cents as it would open the doors to a class of patrons he did not wish to cater to. So there you see the nickel proposition gets another jolt.

In addition to the change of conditions that has brought about an increase in the expenses attending the operation of five-cent theaters, there are some very vital agencies bearing against the box offices of such places. The law against permitting children under sixteen years of age to visit the theaters and allowing people to stand in the aisles and foyers have curtailed the receipts considerably. For a time these laws were winked at, but the vigor with which they have since been enforced can be well understood when it is stated that in Greater New York alone each of one hundred and fifty moving picture men paid a fine of fifty dollars in one month.

There is to be a marked revival of the moving picture road show business next fall. Several years ago such shows were very numerous and many of them made money until the nickelodeon took growth. I understand that from the Metropolis alone six outfits will be put on the road with a series of spectacular pictures that are creating much interest. The venture promises to be a big success. If it is, look out for a general launching of traveling shows. All eyes are on the initial effort and a number of old road men with some capital to spare are ready to put out serial motion pictures in up-to-date style. They figure that with appropriate music and lectures some of the productions of recent years can be put on at one-night stands with good results, financially and otherwise.

An old-time showman revealed to me the other night a plan he has for exploiting the "Uncle Tom's Cabin" films. With a colored quartette and a lecturer he counts on big returns. His idea is to have the lecturer precede the pictures with a brief recital based upon the life of Harriet Beecher Stowe, the authoress of the famous story of slavery days. During the exhibition of the pictures the lecturer will tell the old, old story, occasionally giving way to the quartette. Some scheme, eh? With big advance billing it might go well, but the undertaking will be at an unmistakable disadvantage, the same that put the old road shows out of business. The people who operate picture theaters along the route will be forewarned by the advance advertising and will lose no time in getting the same films from their exchanges, and it is a poor town that does not contain home talent for the lecture and songs. The production may not be as elaborate as the one contemplated by the old showman; but in adverse effect to the visitor it can be made far-reaching. I stated all this to the showman, but it did not disconcert him. He said he knew of "Uncle Tomers" who had followed each other season after season with a bunch of people on the payroll and made money at 10, 20 and 30. He may be right after all. A well-known traveling picture show appeared in a Western city recently and cleaned up over five thousand dollars on the week, with "The Funeral of King Edward" as the program feature.

Clean Lenses.—There are many operators who do not properly appreciate the necessity of absolute cleanliness as regards the lenses, both condenser and objective.

Dust and dirt, even in small amount, not only directly obstruct the rays of light but also cause diffusion, injuring, to some extent, the sharpness of the picture on the screen.

Condenser lenses should be cleaned daily, especially if they be working an eleven or twelve hour show. It requires but a very few minutes to remove, polish and replace them in their mount. Never use anything but a very soft, very clean cloth for this purpose. Alcohol may be used, but if the cleaning is done daily it is only necessary to breathe on the cold lens and rub same lightly until dry again.

The outer surface of the objective lens should be polished daily, particular care being taken to remove all oil. For this reason alcohol is excellent for the inner lens. Extreme care must be had that, after polishing, the fingers do not touch the lens surface at all. The least finger mark, often almost invisible to the naked eye, will seriously injure the sharpness on the screen.

Once in a while, say, once a month, the combinations should be very carefully taken apart and polished on their inner surface, care being had that no lint is left on the lens surface. The lens mount is, or should be, very tight, but nevertheless dust will get in and that dust is not good for projection. It is sometimes difficult to take apart the very cheap lenses and for this reason, if for no other, their purchase is inadvisable. As a matter of fact, projection lenses are, or too many of them are, altogether too cheaply constructed. These extremely cheap lenses are poor articles from any and every point of view. Remembering that the whole show comes through the lens, it would seem that managers would realize and recognize the fact that it cannot possibly pay to save a few cents, or even a few dollars, in their purchase. Altogether too little attention is paid to the matter of lenses. In installing a house of my own I would not think of allowing five, ten or even twenty dollars to stand in the way of securing an especially good grade of lens.

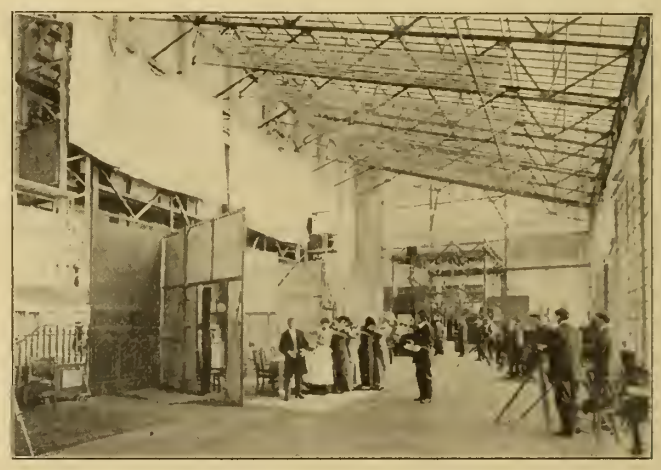
Not so very long ago a manager and myself were discussing this point and he denied any difference in results between the cheap and the better lenses. In proof he projected a picture with each and I freely admit the fact that seemingly both gave practically equal results, both being new.

In reply I took both lenses apart. The cheap one I could not possibly get open without butchering the screw rings up with a knife and I cut a finger in the operation. Getting it together was a real task. Nothing fit well. The other came apart with perfect ease and went together "like grease." I pointed out to this man the fact that by the time the cheap lens was taken apart for cleaning about three times it would be in almost useless condition; also that an operator would be far less likely to keep such a lens in clean, proper condition, considering the difficulty involved, than he would the better article. I called his attention to the fact that the better lens would still be in excellent condition when the cheap one was a total wreck. I asked him if he thought the performance of the two lenses, granting them to be equal, or nearly so now, would be the same in six months. He admitted the very obvious fact that it was not likely.

In purchasing a lens, examine the mounting very carefully and remove the two combinations, taking same apart. If this cannot be very readily done and the same restored with perfect ease, reject the lens. The dealer may tell you what he will, but take it from me that lens combinations must be taken apart and cleaned occasionally for best results. I advise all managers and operators to see to it that this is done. Because an objective lens looks perfectly clean when you look through it, is no proof that it is. The fine specks of dust cannot be seen thus, when they are on the inner surfaces of the combinations.

Union Wanted.—Connecticut, name of city suppressed, writes: "Have received much valuable information through the Projection Department. Am a licensed operator (Connecticut license) and desire to become a member of a union. Would it be possible to join the New York local, or would I have to get a New York license before they would accept me? If so, from whom and how could I get an application blank, and what day do they give examinations?"

You could not join the New York union without having a New York license. To get that it would be necessary that you appear in person in New York City, and make application and then wait, or return, for examination. I cannot tell you how much time would elapse between application and examination. You would be notified by mail. Would suggest that you correspond with Springfield, Mass., union. They have been given jurisdiction over considerable territory. Whither or not your city is included I cannot say, nor have I the street address of the Springfield union.



Interior of the Lubin Studio, Philadelphia, Pa.

Studios.—New Orleans, La., writes: "I have often wondered how the scenes are prepared for the pictures. Cannot you give me some idea of how it is done?"

This letter came some weeks ago. I have just now secured a picture of the Lubin studio with which to make my reply clear. In taking pictures in a studio (nearly all interior scenes are made in a studio) the various scenes are staged precisely as are those on the regular stage, except that the scenery is set right on the floor instead of on an elevated stage. The studio is a large room and the best ones are well lighted by ample window surface and skylights, so that daylight may be made use of. However, a very large percentage of scenes are photographed by artificial light from special lamps made for the purpose. The light usually used is of a greenish tinge and the actors, so lighted, have a ghastly, awful look—not present in the picture, however.

In the picture you see some of these lamps under the framework at the rear of the room. They are not being used, the scene rehearsing being probably intended to be taken by natural light. In the lower, right hand corner are two cameras ready for action. You see the interior of the room and the actors rehearsing, the director, with a paper in his hand, giving instructions. The camera lens will not take in the top of the scenery nor reach beyond the figured wall paper, though, as there is a door in the opposite side it will probably reach almost to the outer end of the scene on that side. The actors must keep within a certain, prescribed space, the lines possibly being marked on the floor. Very often ropes are stretched on the floor marking the field of the lens, from camera to scenery. You will notice that a piece of scenery representing the wall of a room is set up against the wall outside the actual scene. This is because the field reached through the door in the scenery, supposedly into another room, and it would not do to have the bare wall of the studio show. The scene you see will, when photographed, give the impression of the interior of a room. There are two cameras so that should one run out of film or meet with some accident, the other may be immediately started and complete the scene. Also, I believe, in some cases, where the scene would be expensive to reproduce should anything go wrong with the negative, two cameras are run and two negatives made at the same time. I know this is occasionally done, but I don't know whether or not it is a general practice. The actors make up, talk and act much as they would in a regular theater, except that much more attention is paid to gesticulation and facial expression. The titles are made by painting them in black on white cardboard and training the camera on them at short range.

Film Mender.—Mr. H. S. Klink, Canton, Ohio, who seems to be one of the Department's live wires, writes: "Enclosed find sketch of a little device I am using with the best of results. It is a film mender made from steel 5/8 inch wide by 1/4 inch thick.

The two pieces are three inches in length, each hinged together at one end. 1 and 1A are small teeth, about the same shape as those on a sprocket and the width of a perforation hole in a film, while 2 and 2A are small holes drilled deep enough to receive the teeth, A and A1 when the two parts are brought together. I do not claim it to be an automatic mender—only a quick and sure appliance to match the holes, and an effective press for the patch. I do not claim to be its originator, but have seen nothing like it described in print so far. To use, prepare the ends of the film in the usual manner. The rest is obvious. Mounting the mender on a small block isn't a bad idea. I have mine fixed that way.

"Perhaps you wonder why the device has but one pair of teeth. I make my patch, as per Fig. 2, so as not to split the sprocket holes. If one wishes to split sprocket holes, as per Fig. 3, I would advise him to have more than one set of teeth."

Many thanks, Neighbor Klink, for excellent sketch and description of the device. It is no doubt excellently adapted for its purpose. As I have pointed out, time and again, the chief value of the department lies in just such interchange of ideas between operators and managers. Very likely some operator, maybe in the Philippine Islands, maybe in New York City, or far off Australia will see your sketch; think some device he is using is better and submit it, the same as you have yours. Thus we would have knowledge of two or more film mending devices conveyed to more than 10,000 operators scattered all over the world, many of whom have possibly been wishing for just such an article. And so it is with other things. To make a really good, strong patch some kind of press for applying instant, even and considerable pressure is essential, but very few are actually used, which in part accounts for the fact that three patches out of four are poor ones.

Ninety Degree Lamp.—Arizona (name of town suppressed) asks what is meant by a "Ninety Degree Lamp," and whether or not they are better for projection than those in ordinary use.

A Ninety Degree Lamp is one in which the carbons set exactly at right angles to each other. Some operators like them fairly well for stereopticon work. They give more light per ampere, if handled right, but they are somewhat difficult to manipulate. They have not been found to be adapted for motion picture work, for several reasons.

Union Addresses.—Chicago writes: "Why don't you set apart a column for the publication of addresses of secretaries of operators' unions? It seems to me such information is needed and would be of distinct value. I notice you have, on several occasions, wished to give some one the address of a union, but did not yourself have it."

We will be pleased to publish the union addresses in a column headed Operators' Union Addresses, also giving space to brief official papers from unions, provided same do not contain matter not suitable for publication in a paper of this sort, which caters to and serves all classes of the trade. It is up to the unions themselves. If they want it bad enough to supply the needed data, all right; the space is theirs. We do not, however, propose to offer valuable space and then go out and pry the addresses loose with a crowbar. I speak thus for the reason that we have offered this before. It is up to the unions!

Rheostat Overloaded.—Texas (name of town suppressed) writes: "My rheostat coils get quite red. The resistance is all in and still the wires are cherry red. What ought I do?"

Your rheostat is too small (contains too little resistance) for the voltage. You can add some coils of No. 8 soft iron wire (not galvanized) attaching same to porcelain knobs on the wall, with the heavy sheet asbestos between them and the wall, and a suitable guard in front to prevent burns or shocks by accidental contact, and hitch these coils in series with the rheostat. Use just enough of the added mixture to take out the red. This will, however, operate to reduce your amperage. The thing to do is get a rheostat suited to the voltage you are using. If you run with the coils quite red they won't last long.

What Is It?—Denver, Colo., writes: "In some films, particularly in scenic views, I notice a queer effect resembling falling snow. It cannot be snow since they are often summer scenes, some of them taken in a hot country. What it is?"

The effect you describe is often present. I have noticed it time and again myself. It only occurs in ourdoor scenes; therefore, I believe, cannot be due to defective emulsion. It also seems never to be present in winter scenes. I may be entirely wrong, but have formed the theory that it is due to the temporary stoppage or displacement of light rays by gases in the atmosphere, the same being result of heat. If I am wrong I shall be glad to be set right in the matter. The above is merely my own theory.

St. Louis Again.—St. Louis writes: "Received handbook and it is the one most necessary thing in the operating room. It is well worth its price. In July 29th issue, under heading "Side Motion," you answered my last letter. I have tried setting in the bushings, but while waiting for your answer I consulted the Edison Manufacturing Company and am sending you their letter and a paper attached. I am trying to get a rock-steady picture. It can and must be done. I can get only two makes of film to run steady, viz: Edison and Biograph. I accomplish it by shifting the take-up sprocket. But the film will run off the lower sprocket about every three minutes. Please advise me how to overcome this trouble."

Do I understand that you cause the two makes of film to run steady by shifting the lower sprocket out of line? If so, the only thing that I can imagine is that the side motion is held out by twisting the lower loop. That is a new one on the editor. Possibly you can prevent the film climbing the sprocket by strengthening the spring holding the roller bracket. However, as long as the sprocket is out of line there will be a decided tendency to lose the lower loop.

Brick Booth.—Pennsylvania (name of town suppressed) writes: "I purchased a picture house here a year and a half ago. The operating room was of soft asbestos on an iron frame, the iron being inside the room. This the factory inspector passed. I am now considering the matter of remodeling the theater and have an idea of my own for the operating room. I propose constructing the room entirely of fire brick, side walls to be eight inches thick, with an eight-inch arch of brick for the top. Floor can be of brick, cemented over to whatever thickness required. There may be plenty of such rooms, but I have never heard of one. I can install such a room at half the cost of asbestos construction, provided the inspector will approve same. What do you think of the dimensions named? This is a third-class city and the Pennsylvania State law calls for asbestos operating rooms.

in cities of that class. Please give me your candid opinion of the brick room idea. Have one of your handbooks and find it very helpful. My projection is excellent, patrons claiming that I show the brightest picture in the valley. I do a fair, steady business. House is always lighted, so that one may read a paper during the show."

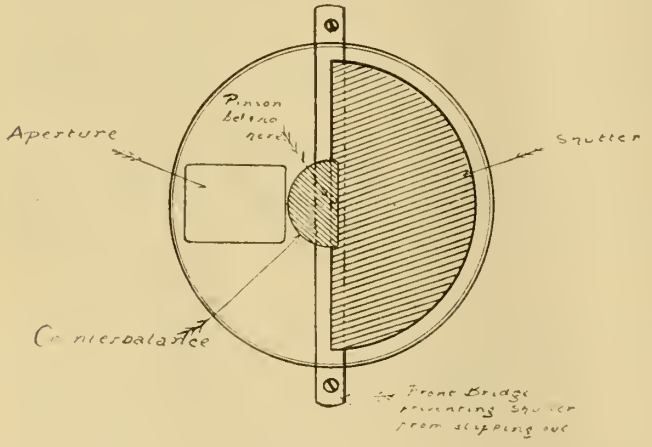
You have not given dimensions of the proposed room, but only thickness of walls and arch. Provided the walls and arch are to be laid in rich cement mortar, the floor cemented and a vent flue arranged for, from top of arch to open air, same to be ample in size, I would consider such a room most excellent. I do not know how the Pennsylvania law reads, but even though asbestos be stipulated, certainly any construction which was unquestionably its equivalent in fire prevention would have to be passed. It would be well, however, to consult the factory inspector before proceeding. Soft asbestos on an iron frame is by no means a desirable material for operating room walls. Whatever you do, when you build that new room make it of ample size and provide a vent flue from ceiling to open air—see the Department, August 12 issue, for proper proportional dimensions of same.

Length of Throw.—Henderson, Ky., asks: "Will you please advise us as to the best place, or distance, to place our machine from the screen? We can set at 40 or at 110 feet. Will get as good light and projection at 110 feet as at 40, having same size picture and same amperage."

I will answer you by saying that if it were my own house and I could set at 40 or 110 feet I would unhesitatingly choose the longer throw. Unless you would be exceptionally lucky in securing a good, short focal length lens you would get much the better picture at 110 feet. Particularly is this true if you propose throwing a good sized picture. With a very small picture the shorter distance might be as good, or even better. By "very small" I mean ten feet or under.

Shutter.—Brownsville, Texas, writes: "I noticed in the Trouble Department of July 8th (p. 1581), you have published the most important part of my letter, although slightly altered. There is one sentence which reads: 'When a light is thrown on the screen through a film, with machine running, no flicker whatsoever appears.' This sentence should read, as in my former letter: 'without a film in machine'; for there is not only no flicker with film in machine, but also without a film, when machine is in motion. You say you do not quite understand what I mean by the shutter having a movement of one in six. The shutter being the exact half of a circular disc, and making three complete revolutions to each exposure of the picture, it is cutting off the light three times and allowing the light three times to penetrate, thus producing six complete changes of light and darkness to each picture exposure. I have enclosed sketch of shutter, with its relation to aperture, giving exact size of same."

I can see no possible difference between your shutter and the ordinary outside shutter having three wings of equal width, so far as getting into synchronism with one side of the alternations be concerned. Your shutter and the three-wing outside shutter cut the light precisely the same number of times per second, therefore their action, so far as alternation synchronism be concerned, would necessarily be identical.



As to the relative desirability of such a shutter, as opposed to the three-wing article, that is a matter for argument. It is the first time I have known of a shutter being run at that speed, viz: 2,880 revolutions per minute at normal speed. Certainly it would necessitate pretty fine balancing of the shutter. I have no doubt but that the flicker would be absent, however.

Films Jump.—Cheney, Kansas, writes: "Enclosed find $1.50 for handbook. Have been a reader of The World but a short while and have received much good therefrom. Have a light trouble I would like solved. Am using 110-volt A. C., through an Edison rheostat. The light seems to get dim for just an instant and then will brighten up O. K. again. Also have another trouble—the same old cry—picture doing a clog dance on the screen. When the machine was new there was no trouble. Since the picture began to jump have put in a new cam, star and intermittent sprocket; also aperture plate and tension springs. Use Independent service. At the last show two of the reels were pretty near past looking at. Sometimes the picture would jump up very nearly half out of frame. The other, a 'Lux,' ran perfectly steady. Is the trouble in the film or the machine? On some films the sprocket-holes show, sometimes on one side, sometimes on the other. Do some makes of film jump worse than others? What is the cause of it? Just built a new airdome and, not being able to secure an electrician, did the wiring myself. Have the display lights cut in ahead of the switch for my machine circuit. What effect will this have on arc, if any?"

The dimming of the light for an instant may be due to a loose connection. Go over all connections, including those of rheostat, carefully. Take connections apart and clean them thoroughly. It might also be due to carbon fault, though hardly likely if you have correctly described the effect. If the incandesecnt lights dim at the same time, it is probably due to some fault at the powerhouse. A loose connection is, however, the most likely thing. Yes, some makes of film jump more than others. It is generally due to uneven perforation. If some films run perfectly it would indicate that the fault does not lie in the machine. See to it that your tension springs are giving sufficient tension. If your picture has a tendency to creep up on the screen as the speed of the machine is increased it indicates slack tension springs. Bow them out by sticking a screwdriver under and pulling out, running the tool up and down as you do it. If the sprocket holes show first on one side and then on the other I would see that the guide on top of the gate hugs the film closely, but without binding. Also be sure there is no end motion in intermittent sprocket, and that all sprockets are in line with each other and with the aperture. See that your tension springs rest squarely on the aperture plate tracks, and that they are not loose so that they move from side to side. You did not say what model machine you have; therefore it is difficult to give accurate advice. Also you did not say whether or no you used the same service at the time the film did not jump—when the machine was new, above all things see to it that the face (rims) of your intermittent sprocket are kept perfectly clean. Dirt and grime on the intermittent is a prolific cause of film jump.

A Question.—Hinton, W. Va., encloses $1.50 for handbook and asks: "Is it possible for a man to become a first-class operator without working under a first-class man?"

It is; but the process is very much slower. A comparatively few years ago we had no such things as motion pictures; therefore, no such things as operators. The first operators had no one, first-class or otherwise, to learn under. It is much better, however, to serve an apprenticeship under a competent operator, supplementing practice with hard, intelligently directed study.

Lens Extension, Aberdeen, Wash., writes: When I opened the 'Rex,' in order to make my old lens focus, I had an extension made about three inches long which I screwed onto the end of the tube. I then took out the front glass and moved it out to the end of the exension, which gave me the required focus but made my tube three inches longer than it was originally. Now what I want to know is: Would I get any better results if I had a tube of natural length, the lenses ground, of course, so as to focus right. It is rather an expensive proposition to try and experiment with lenses way out here so far away from the supply houses. Therefore I am forced to trouble you with this question. My throw is 98 feet; 10 x 13 foot picture.

You certainly ought to get a new lens. It is not at all probable that you are getting good results with a lens patched up in that way. In fact, the results ought to be pretty bad. You need a seven-inch E. F. lens. If you wish I will select a lens for you and have it sent by express, C. O. D., or you can order from your supply house, cautioning them to give you a lens projecting a 13-foot picture at 98 feet, and one that will project a perfectly sharp picture.

Trouble, Newark, N. J., writes: "Am using a Powers Five machine. The film jumps off the lower sprocket when a patch goes through. I must keep take-up belt very tight or reel stops before all film is rewound. I have no valve on bottom magazine. Would this have any effect in causing film to run off sprocket? There is a spring and compression nut on end of takeup spindle. If belt gets loose, should I loosen or tighten the nut and will that tighten the belt?"

See to it that your bottom loop hangs square and that the lower sprocket is in exact line with intermittent sprocket and aperture plate tracks. Also see that the idler on lower sprocket is set away from the sprocket by about twice the thickness of a film, and that the spring holding bracket is strong enough to hold idler firmly in place. No, the absence of valve from magazine will not affect running of film, but just the same you should by all means have the valve. The compression nut on takeup spindle has absolutely nothing whatever to do with tightening the belt. The spring is to press together the two halves of the split pulley, and the split pulley is to regulate the takeup tension. The belt is not supposed to slip at all, except on the loose half of the pulley. It is the two halves of the pulley rubbing against each other that provides the tension. Take it apart and look at it for yourself. Maybe the reason your takeup pulls hard is that you have not properly oiled the shaft bearings.

Film Rocks.—Hamilton, Mont., writes: "Handbook received some time ago and will say it is the best thing for operators I ever saw. Would not part with mine for twice what I paid for it if I knew I could not get another. Have noticed several letters in the Department in regard to threading machine and running song at the same time. That is the way we always do here and I have machine threaded and ready before first verse of song is over. Always pull film through machine to title and thread it with title in frame. It is the only thing we can do, as all films have about a four-foot blank leader on them. Would like to ask what will cause a picture to rock like a ship on the water; only happens once in awhile and there is only one make of films which does it."

If only one make of film "rocks," that is proof positive that the fault is in the film itself. Probably something wrong with the perforation. Have many complaints about that particular make of film, in this respect. That man does not live who can run a song, especially a fast one, thread a machine at the same time and do full justice to both things. Certainly the thing can be done; no one disputes that proposition. I have done it myself, but never will again. The best interest of the house is served when everything, stereo or motion, on the screen is PERFECT. It is only perfect when your whole attention is centered on the one thing you are doing.

Lnve Wire.—Mr. M. L. May writes from LaSalle, Ill.: "I visit four or five theaters weekly and last week ran into a real live wire. In the city of Galva, Ill., I had the pleasure of meeting Mr. F. Spaulding, manager of the Columbine Theater. The house seats 250. He has a Motiograph. Mr. Spaulding was at one time a Chicago operator. He has his own light plant, which was installed at a cost of about $850. Owing to the many inquiries concerning light plants for motion picture theaters, Mr. Spaulding informs me that he will be glad to furnish anyone desiring the information with full particulars regarding his plant."

Glad to hear from him, or from a "live wire" in the business at any time. Would suggest that the gentleman favor us with a description of his lighting plant for publication in the Department, including cost of current generated per K. W. or per hour, stating number and C. P. of lights and cost of fuel.

Lens Problem.—Michigan (name of town suppressed) writes: "Have run up against some problems in the handbook which I do not understand. On pages 77 and 78 you give rules for figuring lenses, but I cannot make them work out right, nor do they agree with the tables on other pages. Where is the error? I am studying hard and want to understand it all."

The matter on pages 75, 76, 77 and 78 was taken, by permission, as stated on p. 75, from a Bausch & Lomb publication. This matter, and the tables of lenses were about all the matter contained in the book not the product of my own pen. My own rule for figuring lenses is found on pages 67 and 68, and it is as nearly accurate as it is possible to figure, when using cheap, inaccurate lenses such as are used for projection. Stereo figures are never very accurate because of the fact that, while a slide mat is supposed to be three inches wide, very few of them are actually exactly that measure.

Wild and Wooly West.—Pendleton, Oregon, writes: "I enclose photo of our house,, decorated for July 4th. We celebrate the 'Grand Old Day" out here and it is no "Safe and Sane" stuff either. This is the land of the fuzzy-legged cowboy, and real, simon-pure, blown-in-the-bottle Indians and they sure tear loose with some wild doings on the Fourth. I also enclose program of the celebration and program of the theater, the latter written by your Humble Scribe, who does all the ad. dope for the house. We run the story of the films in the daily paper. Manager Cooper and wife are standing in front, in the picture, but the writer was busy at the time grinding out 'Photoplays.' We run 4,000 feet of Independent film, four changes a week. I have noticed in the World (Long may it live and prosper!) the statement that projection in the West, taken as a whole is better than in the East. There is a reason. As I said, we have with us the real cowboy and sure 'nuff Indians and they are some touchy. If the film breaks once they will stand for it, but the second time—Wow! There are doings. Look out for tommyhawks! Poor light for more than five consecutive minutes is sufficient excuse for a delegation of earnest gents to pay the operator a visit, while a couple of mis-frames will create a riot. Of course, we have bullet-proof operating rooms, but owing to necessary holes in the wall, have to wear steel armor and it is quite uncomfortable in this hot climate. I trust I have made clear why projection is good out this way. Lest some of my Eastern brothers doubt the accuracy of my statements, I call attention to my name C. P. Bruce. The 'C. P.' stands for 'Can't Prevaricate.' I have been out here six years now, and you could not coax me back to the effete East. Boston is my home city. Your handbook is worth its weight in diamonds. It is a wonder. We couldn't do business without it and The World."

My gracious, Friend Bruce, I'm glad you mentioned what your initials stand for! That steel armor must be perfectly awful, really! I wish you would loan me a delegation of the very worst fuzzy-legs and Indians you have. I will have them attend a few New York shows I know of, taking an extra supply of bullets and tommyhawks along in a bushel basket. In 1883-4 the editor of this department fired the Oregon Short Line track-laying engine from Shoshone almost to Pendleton. The program is excellently gotten up, and that of the celebration is a corker. The theater front is pretty, especially the—but no, I mustn't say it. She is married!

The New Law.—The following law, referred to last week, has been passed by the Legislature at Albany, signed by the Governor and is now in full force and effect, and became law June 6, 1911.

THE LAW.

Section 1. Article two of chapter twenty-six of the laws of nineteen hundred and nine, entitled, "An act in relation to cities, constituting chapter twenty-one of the consolidated laws," is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof, a new section, to be section eighteen, and to read as follows:

Sec. 18. License to operate moving picture apparatus. It shall not be lawful for any person or persons to operate any moving picture apparatus and its connections in a city of the first class unless such person or persons so operating such apparatus is duly licensed as hereinafter provided. Any person desiring to act as such operator shall make application for a license to so act to the mayor or licensing authority designated by the mayor unless the charter of said city so designates, which officer shall furnish to each applicant blank forms of application which the applicant shall fill out. Such officer shall make rules and regulations governing the examination of applicants and the issuance of licenses and certificates. A license shall not be granted to an applicant unless he shall have served as an apprentice under a licensed operator, for a period of not less than six months prior to the date of the application; the application must be made in writing, and contain a verified statement to that effect; it must be accompanied by the affidavit of the licensed operator to the same effect; before entering upon the period of apprenticeship the applicant must register his name and address with the officer issuing such license. The applicant shall be given a practical examination under the direction of the officer required to issue such license and if found competent as to his ability to operate moving picture apparatus and its connections shall receive within six days after such examination a license as herein provided. Such license may be revoked or suspended at any time by the officer issuing the same. Every license shall continue in force for one year from the date of issue unless sooner revoked or suspended. Every license, unless revoked or suspended, as herein provided, may at the end of one year from the date of issue thereof, be renewed by the officer issuing it in his discretion upon application and with or without further examination as he may direct. Every application for renewal of license must be made within the thirty days previous to the expiration of such license. With every license granted there shall be issued to every person obtaining such license a certificate, certifying that the person named therein is duly authorized to operate moving picture apparatus and its connections. Such certificate shall be displayed in a conspicuous place in the room where the person to whom it is issued operates moving picture apparatus and its connections. No person shall be eligible to procure a license unless he shall be of full age. Any person offending against the provisions of this section, as well as any person who employs or permits a person not licensed as herein provided to operate moving picture apparatus and its connections, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding the sum of one hundred dollars, or imprisonment for a period not exceeding three months, or both.

Sec. 2. This act shall take effect immediately, but shall not affect or apply to existing licenses, nor to the holders of existing licenses.

State of New York, Office of the Secretary of State, ss.: I have compared the preceding with the original law on file in this office, and do hereby certify that the same is a correct transcript therefrom and the whole of said original law.

EDWARD LAZANSKY,
Secretary of State.

You will observe that as the law now reads, no person may be licensed except he has served six months' apprenticeship, or more, under a licensed operator. This means, in effect, more than appears on the surface. It means that, inasmuch as New York does not officially recognize licenses of other states or cities, a man, no matter what his previous experience elsewhere, must serve six months bona fide apprenticeship under an operator licensed in New York. Could absurdity go further? But this is not all. Section 2 reads that the law shall not affect or apply to existing licenses or to holders thereof. Do you realize just what this means? If your card should expire for one single day, by reason of failure to register in time or any other cause, you are then not a holder of an "existing license!" You will therefore be compelled to serve six months under a New York licensed operator before you can be again granted a license.

Beyond question such a law would not stand the test of the courts for a single moment, but what operator could afford to "test" it? It creates an utterly absurd situation. It is quite likely that the authorities will be advised not to attempt its enforcement—advised by Corporation Counsel, I mean. This I cannot of course, say for certain. Certainly, however, the Department would not be so foolish as to attempt enforcement without securing legal advice, since enforcement might lay the State liable for damages. The whole trouble lies in the omission of a couple of words. If Section 2 read "Nor the holders of existing or previous licenses," it would fix things so far as New York men are concerned. It should, however, also contain the words: "Or holders of licenses from other cities or states."

You will observe that the obnoxious Non-Citizen clause is eliminated. Non-citizens can now obtain license in New York but, as most, if not all of them, have already lost their licenes under the previous law, they are as bad off as before, if the present law is enforced. Truly our lawmakers are a brilliant lot, and the drafter of the present legal joke should indeed be proud of his effort! Don't think I'm giving the Department pointers by writing this—they already know all about it.

Machine Trouble.—Laona, Wisconsin, writes: "You will remember me as the locomotive engineer-exhibitor, who had some correspondence before. I bought a handbook at that time and it proved to be a great benefit to me in my picture work. I recently bought an Edison Exhibition machine and it came in pieces (second-hand). With the aid of the handbook I set it up easily, even to setting the shutter and putting a new pin in the pin-wheel. Setting that shutter reminded me of setting a slide valve. I have quit railroading, however, but still have my card in the B. of L. F. & E. I sincerely hope that the exhibitors will some day have an organization as strong as the Brotherhood. You having at one time belonged to it, well know that should the exhibitors ever get to be organized as they are, there certainly will be a change in the way service is handed out. Being a pretty fair mechanic, I get along pretty well with my machine, but occasionally I find something that bothers me. For instance, that second-hand Edison, although it is in good shape and makes a fine picture, also makes a lot of noise. It seems to be just as the pin enters the slot in the star. I put a new pin in, but it don't seem to help much. Possibly all Edisons make that noise, but I don't believe it. It is a one-pin machine and even now with the new pin you can rattle the star wheel against the pin just a little. Do you think that means a new star wheel?"

Pleased to know the handbook meets your approval. Yes, if the exhibitors had an organization even one-half as solid, compact and effective as is the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers they could rectify many wrongs. Maybe they will have one some day, but they're certainly pretty slow making anything even resembling an effective start. As to the noise, I'm afraid I cannot tell you surely just what it is. Look at the slots in the star and try them with a thin straightedge. If they are worn out wider near their base than at the top, get a new star. The greatest amount of force is exerted by the pin when it is near the base of the slot, as you will understand by studying the movement a little; therefore the slot wears fastest there. If it is true that the pin makes a noise as it enters the star, and does not strike the end of the slot (which is almost impossible) I should say it indicates something loose somewhere. It is also possible that, in setting the intermittent you have gotten one end of the intermittent shaft higher than the other. That quite possibly would make considerable noise. It also sometimes happens that the cam-pin will strike the base of the star-slot, which makes lots of noise. It is also true that some stars and cams make more noise than others. Even the intermittent of some new machines makes considerable, though probably nothing like yours does. I cannot advise you further, Laona, I fear. Second-hand machines are sometimes tough propositions.

Various Things.—New York City writes: "Please answer the following: (1) My throw is 85 feet; picture 12 feet. What focal length condensers ought I use? (2) If the picture is blurred, with dark spot in center, does it indicate wrong focal length condensers? (3) Can I fit a Powers burner on an Edison lamp? (4) Can I set up a Powers head on an Edison table? (5) Is it necessary to take an objective lens apart and clean the inside? How can dust possibly get inside?"

(1) I would use two 7½ or one 7½ and one 6½ lens, whichever gives best results. (2) The blurring is probably due to some fault of your objective lens. Oil on the lens would cause it. Even a very faint finger mark will do it. The objective lens must be kept absolutely clean. The dark spot (ghost) may be due to wrong focal length condensers, to spherical aberration in condenser lenses or to having your lamphouse too close to the machine. Try moving lamphouse back first, unless it is set clear back now. (3) Don't know what you mean by a "Powers Burner." (4) Yes. (5) It is. How does dust get into a screw-bezzle watch case? I can't tell you how it gets in, but it does.

Help!—Mr. J. W. Wilson, Wonderland Theater, Dunnville, Canada, writes: "Why no Moving Picture World for past two weeks? If you want to kill me give me the privilege of choosing the method and don't do it by stopping the 'World.' Candidly, it is a journal I appreciate very much and only wish Canada's news therein were larger in volume."

Heavens, man, we'll certainly have to look the matter up and save your life. Glad you think so highly of our humble efforts. May we continue to merit your approbation.

Citizenship.—Elizabeth, N. J., asks: "Is it necessary to be a citizen of the United States to procure a license in Boston? Is there an operators' union in that city and is there any fee or examination necessary to joining?"

I believe Massachusetts has no citizenship law, that particular piece of absurdity being peculiar to New York. Yes, there is a union and a fee and examination is necessary to join it.

Seating.—Minneapolis, Minn., asks: "My partner and I are having some difference of opinion and have decided to leave the matter to you. I favor a twenty-inch seat, with some kind of upholstering. My partner favors an eighteen-inch non-upholstered chair. Which is the better, and why?"

In my judgment you are both partly right and partly wrong. The eighteen-inch chair is too narrow to be very comfortable, particularly for such patrons as are inclined to be fleshy. The twenty-inch one is better. True, it allows of but ten chairs in a space which would accommodate eleven of the smaller chair, but, unless your seating capacity is quite limited the added comfort will, in my judgment, more than make up for the loss. I do not favor upholstered chairs in a motion picture house. They are much harder to keep clean and are warmer in summer. The patron ordinarily is only in the seat about an hour and finds the non-upholstred chair, if rightly formed, quite comfortable. If it were to be occupied two or three hours, as in the legitimate theater, that would be another story. Twenty-inch, non-upholstered chairs, of good grade, form the ideal seat for a moving picture theater. Eighteen-inch ones may be used in houses of limited seating capacity.

BAXTER MORTON SAILS.

Mr. Baxter Morton, general manager of the Nicholas Power Company, sailed for Europe, Saturday, August 5. He will be away several months and will cover the motion picture field of the British Isles and the entire continent. Mr. Morton will go over the situation with a fine tooth comb and if there is a moving picture man in Europe during the next three months who does not hear a lot about the Powers Cameragraph No. 6, it will be because there is something the matter with his hearing.

AMERICAN-ECLAIR ORGANIZING STOCK FORCES.

The work of organizing the New America-Eclair Film Company's dramatic stock company is now practically complete. Directors Lawrence B. McGill, Gaston Larry and Will S. Rising have selected nearly every one of those who will be seen in prominent roles in the forthcoming American releases. In the work of selecting artists the Eclair Company has kept in mind the fact that the theater-going public is partial to pretty women and handsome men, especially those who have appeared to advantage in the regular theaters throughout the United States.

Among those engaged and now under contract, Dorothy Gibson, the famous Harrison Fisher model, is perhaps best known to the magazine reading public and the playgoer. Harrison Fisher, the artist, consented to Miss Gibson's acceptance of the Eclair Company's flattering offer only on condition that she continue to pose for him twice each month. Miss Gibson is also a prominent theatrical star.

Helen Marten, another member signed, is well known in the East for having won the first prize in the New York World "Spring Maid" beauty contest. Miss Marten was selected as being the prettiest among four thousand contestants. Her work in various dramatic road organizations has further increased her popularity.

Margaret Severance, the famous Protean actress, comes direct from the high class vaudeville field, where she appeared in her own dramatic playlet, "Looking Backward." In this production she appeared in six varied roles, ranging from a very young girl to an aged woman. Her work with Daniel and Charles Frohman's companies is too well known to need comment.

Virginia Rodgers, a winsom miss of sixteen summers, has played child parts in dramatic productions since she was a baby. She later became identified with the New York Hippodrome, where she became famous as a danseuse. Miss Rodgers was subsequently the original "Jimmie Valentine" girl with Gus Edwards Review. The Eclair Company induced her to take up the picture stage for one year.

With this coterie of favorite beauties, together with a well known company of male players, the Eclair Company should consider themselves fortunate. Their first release is scheduled to appear on or about September 15th.

DANTE'S INFERNO, MILANO FILM, A LICENSED PICTURE,

Will Be Handled by the General Film Company Through Mr. Craft as Special Licensee.

The Milano Films Company production of Dante's Inferno was last week twice exhibited in the exhibition room of the Motion Picture Patents Company at their general offices No. 80 Fifth Avenue before two audiences, consisting of officials of both the Motion Picture Patents Company and the General Film Company. There were present: Messrs. Hawley and Marvin, of the Patents Co.; W. J. Rock and A. E. Smith, of the Vitagraph Company; J. J. Kennedy, Biograph; S. Long, Kalem, and P. L. Waters, of the General Film Co. Messrs. Craft and Mozart were there representing the Monopol Film Company, which owns the American rights of the Milano Films Company production of Dante's Inferno.

After viewing the five reels there was but one judgment as to artistic merits of the production—unqualified praise.

As a result of a subsequent conference the following announcement was authorized by the General Film Company and Mr. Craft: "The Milano Film, known as Dante's Inferno, is now a licensed picture and will be leased by the General Film Company. All correspondence in reference thereto is to be addressed as heretofore to P. P. Craft, Manager Monopol Film Co., 145 W. 45th St., New York." This means that the great Milano production can be shown in Licensed houses only.

As far as is known, no conditions were imposed except a weekly tax, nominal in amount. It is believed, that the action of the General Film Co. was due as much to the unquestioned extraordinary merit of the production as to any other influence.

FATE'S FUNNY FROLIC.

A Delightful Light Comedy by the Essanay Chicago Stock.

There is an exceedingly interesting plot in the story of "Fate's Funny Frolic," an Essanay Eastern production, released next week. It is a light comedy of a week-end social affair at a pretty suburban villa in which two young people, victims of a match-maker, are subjected to some astounding adventures through the whims of that irascible old person, M. Fate. Invited to attend a week-end party at the country home of friends, the two young people have never met, though the invitations hint at the other's presence.

It so happens that the two young folks board the same train for the scene of festivities, but a series of unfortunate accidents, of which the young woman is the victim and the young man the unintentional author, occur and create a deep dislike for the young man in the girl's mind. Arriving at the home of her hostess, the young lady is greatly excited over her adventures and believes that she has been purposely annoyed by the young man. While in this condition he is introduced, to her utter dismay. But Old Dan Cupid figured the affair out and six months later the young folks are addressing wedding invitations to their friends.

The photoplay is exceptionally pleasing in the careful management and mounting of the scenes and in the excellent acting. Francis Bushman plays Malcolm; Miss Dorothy Phillips, Alice Trevor, while the other parts are well taken.

JACOBSON'S ARC REFLECTOR.

A device for watching the condition of the arc has been invented by Sydney Julien Jacobson, of Washington, D. C., and a patent for same has been granted. It consists of a lens so attached to the lamp house of the moving picture apparatus that an image or reflection of the exact position of the electrodes generating the illumination for projecting the picture is thrown on an exterior wall. The wasting by burning of the carbons necessitates their readjustment and their position could only be heretofore discovered through a colored glass in the lamp house or by opening the door and looking at the electrodes directly. In either case there was dissatisfaction—the first was indistinct and the second was blinding to the eyes. Then, too, it was necessary for the operator to stop the machine to give attention to the electrodes. Mr. Jacobson's improvement is as follows: Directly opposite the arc or point where the illumination is made in the lamp house, a small hole is made in the wall of lamp house and in front of this opening is placed a small lens suspended from an arm secured on the lamp house. The light passing through this hole is spread by the lens, throwing an exact image of the electrodes on the side wall or any such screen as may be arranged to catch this reflection. So perfect is this lens that even the sparks sputtering from the carbons, as they are consumed, can be observed. The electrodes can be easily readjusted by simply glancing at the image until the proper setting is obtained.

PROCLAIMING ARCHBISHOP PRENDERGAST.

A topical film of extraordinary interest has been made by the Lubin Mfg. Company, of the ceremony of the proclaiming of Right Rev. Edmund F. Prendergast, D. D., as Archbishop of Philadelphia.

A cross-bearer between two acolytes leads the procession. Following this one hundred seminarians and about three hundred priests, wearing black cassocks and white surplices. Among the priests are Jesuits, Augustinians, Redemptorists and other There are also several Dominican monks, two Franciscans and eight Augustinians, wearing the black cowled habit of the hermits of St. Augustine. A stream of purple appears in the procession with the approach of the monsignors and bishops. After the bishops walks the apostolic delegate, Monsignor Falconio. Last of all comes Archbishop Prendergast crowned with the Episcopal mitre, wearing a magnificent cape of cloth of gold. In his right hand he carries a long golden crozier or shepherd's staff.

The picture shows different views along the line of the procession. Throughout it is very interesting, showing exceptionally clear pictures of the apostolic delegate and the different bishops, prelates and priests.

NOVEL PRODUCTION BY NESTOR.

Among the subjects scheduled for early release that promise to be of more than usual interest to exhibitors is one by Nestor entitled "The Parson and the Bully," a Western subject quite different from the everyday article. Taking the story as told by the picture, an old preacher with his wife and two pretty daughters, arrive at a frontier town, where they attempt to do missionary work. They are rather rudely received at the hotel by some of the loungers. Later, when they attempt to hold an outdoor meeting the rough element breaks up the gathering. Somewhat disheartened by the reception given him, the old preacher is determined to stick and telegraphs to his son, a young minister of the athletic school, to come on, as they have found a community that needs his kind of ability.

This is just what the young parson is looking for and presently he arrives in the camp, meeting something like the reception that was accorded his father. Notwithstanding that one or two members of the crowd take a fall out of him, the young parson is game and though he declines an informal scrap in the hotel office, he willingly accepts a proposal to fight it out, Marquis of Queensbury, in the squared circle at a given date, the stake to be a church erected at the expense of the town crowd if he wins. His challenge is accepted and in the next scene a regular boxing match is staged for the picture.

There was a time when the captious critic might properly have questioned the formality of the preparations for a match of this kind to take place in a backwoods town; but, in these days, if there is anywhere that fistiana is better understood than in another place it is in the so-called backwoods town, so the preciseness with which this particular match is put on must be accepted. And, it is some scrap. None of the regular fight pictures offer anything quite so interesting in the way of a boxing match.

Of course the young parson wins out, scoring a clean knockout and, on the following Sunday the site of the new church is dedicated. All the camp is on hand and everyone takes a respectful part in the ceremonies.

The photographic effects are good throughout, contributing much to the value of the subject.

NEW CANADIAN PICTURE COMPANY.

The Moving Picture World has received word from the Canadian Film Manufacturing Company, 613 Ashdown Block, Winnipeg, Canada, that it will soon begin making regular releases which will consist of educational, dramatic, comic, Western and cowboy subjects. This company has in stock a number of films which will soon be placed upon the market. The country surrounding its plant affords beautiful scenery for scenic productions, and there are plenty of ranches and reservations for Western and cowboy films. The Canadian Film Manufacturing Company is looking for agents to handle its productions exclusively in the United States.

A WOMAN EXCHANGE MANAGER.

It is not very often that you run across a young lady assuming the entire charge of a live film exchange, getting new customers, taking care of their wants and superintending the bookings, etc., but there is one to be found in the Troy, N. Y., office of the United Film Company, and her name is Miss E. M. Murphy. To look at Miss Murphy, you would assert that she was still a high school girl, but after talking ing with her a few minutes there was no doubt left in our minds that she knew all there was to be known about films and the business in general.

PICTURES OF TRAP SHOOTING.

The Industrial Moving Picture Company of this city has recently completed the motion pictures of the Grand American handicap trap-shoot which took place at Columbus, Ohio, June 23rd. The pictures were shown here at a private exhibition and are splendid reproductions, showing the prominent trap-shooters of the country at their favorite pastime; the handling of guns and traps, the breaking of the clay birds in the air, etc. The pictures will be exhibited at the various sportsmen's shows throughout the country and at the gun clubs, through the courtesy of the Dupont Powder Company.

Ingvald C. Oes, American representative of the Great Northern Film Company, Copenhagen, Denmark, and general manager of their New York office, sailed from New York for Europe on Monday, August 7th, on a business trip, and will be absent a month or six weeks.

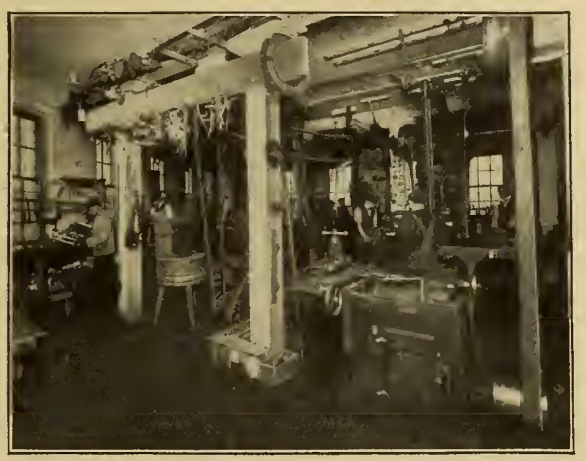
The Home of the Deagan Bells

THE Western representative of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD made a visit the other day to the Deagan factories, 3800 N. Clark St., Chicago, and was indeed astonished at the size of the establishment and the excellent facilities for the manufacturing of Deagan's musical instruments. He was cordially received by Mr. Deagan, a pleasant and congenial gentleman, and taken through the various departments.

J. C. Deagan established this business in 1880, in New York, building the first xylophone that was a practical musical instrument. The drummer to whom this instrument was sold, made such a success with it that Mr. Deagan was called upon from time to time to make more instruments for other professional drummers. Finding that there was such a demand for this class of goods he also started the manufacture of orchestra bells, and from that day to this the name "Deagan" on a set of orchestra bells or xylophones, stands for the highest merit.

Corner of Office at Home of Deagan Bells.

Mr. Deagan, himself was a clarinetist of no mean ability, having held the position of solo clarinetist in many large mnusical organizations. He continued to play professionally and at the same time built musical instruments until the fall of 1899, at which time he entered the manufacturing business exclusively, in Chicago. He came to that city from San Francisco, where he manufactured musical instruments and also played professionally.



View of Machine Shop.

Mr. Deagan is a well-known inventor as well as manufacturer, having been granted some fifty odd patents in foreign lands and in America. He is the inventor of such well-known instruments as organ chimes, aluminum chimes, steel marimbaphones, rosewood marimbaphones, resonating xylophones, parsifal orchestra bells, roundtop orchestra bells, metal bamboos, various styles of hand and electric bells, dinner gongs, cathedral chimes, etc.

Xylophone with Resonators

The Deagan factory occupies three floors well equipped with the most modern machinery, the major portion being built especially for the manufacturing of Deagan's instruments. This was found to be a necessary expedient owing to the fact that the Deagan products are unique—distinctly different from anything of the kind before made, thus requiring special treatment under special conditions.

The plant, which is ideally located, has all the facilities for turning out high class work in large quantities. Following are a few of the many kinds of instruments seen in various stages of construction in the different departments of the factory; altar chimes, for use in church services; clock chimes, which are used in hall clocks; dinner gongs, which are for sale in all the leading jewelry houses throughout the country; special organ attachments, which are sold exclusively to several large organ concerns; cathedral chimes, in large sets for installment in organs; xylophones in every conceivable size, from the miniature instrument that can be packed in a small grip to the monstrous instrument ten and twelve feet long; orchestra bells for drummers' use by the hundred; musical rattles, which have a very beautiful tone; musical coins, that are spun upon the table and give forth a melodious tone; musical sleigh bells, which remind one of Christmas time; musical electric bells, played from keyboard, for installation in picture houses; aluminum and organ chimes, that are played by shaking, giving forth the sweetest melody; a number of sets of parsifal orchestra bells, for large concert and opera companies; tuning forks of every conceivable style and size, from the giant scientific tuning fork to the miniature instrument that is carried in the vest pocket.

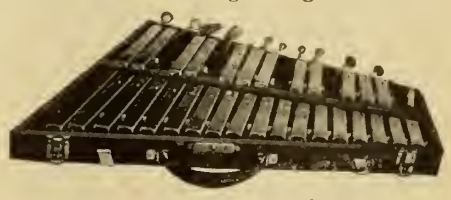
Organ Chimes.

The Deagan organ chimes consist of four bell metal tubes to each frame or tone, illustration showing view from front. They are played by striking or shaking with the hands, similar to sleigh bells. They produce a marvelously voluminous and exhilarating quadruple tone; a tone that captivates and renders overwhelmingly enthusiastic the most conservative audience. In power the tone can be likened to that of a large pipe organ, but the quality is far clearer, more penetrating and bell-like. They are pronounced by leading musicians the finest instruments ever made.

It is hard to form a conception of a factory of this kind. It is certainly an oddity, as when passing through the different departments almost every conceivable sound can be heard produced from the different styles of instruments.

Fancy a greater pandemonium of sound and noise than might be produced by a concert of Deagan instruments and effects? Yet, most charming and likewise startling results may be obtained by their intelligent use.

The Deagan firm, is an old concern, established in 1880, as previously stated, and while now manufacturing a large number of devices to be used in moving picture theatres, among which the musical electric bells form one of the leaders, the business has not been founded on a mushroom basis, as has been the case with many of the present supply concerns. The customers of the firm speak highly of the business methods adopted. One of the Deagan business rules is: "Your money back, if not absolutely satisfied."



Round Top Orchestra Bells.

Comments on the Films

Licensed.

"The Gypsy" (Lubin).—Florence Lawrence has created a new individuality in her representation of this gypsy girl. There are some pretty scenes in this film and they are well photographed, but the picture's great interest centers in the gypsy. She belongs to a truculent Romany band characterized as "dangerous," which has camped on a grassy hillside, the property of a young clubman. The gypsies won't leave, so this man himself comes up from the city and meets the girl. His marriage to her and her reception by the man's mother and sister make a story that is very well acted and acceptable; but one that would surely lack importance without some such intimate picture as Miss Lawrence gives of the girl's untamed but womanly heart. This gypsy girl is not so delightful as a former character of this player, the hoyden, because it is not so close to us; but it roots deeper; there's more to it, and it required more of the artist. It is therefore a more praiseworthy piece of work. The picture gives no typical story of real life; it is not even a probable one.

"The Old Captain" (Selig).—The poignant, old, old story that never grows trite, of age that is compelled to give way to youth, is pictured in this film. The old captain is as fine an old man and sea-dog as ever commanded a ship. The representation of this character is worthy of the highest praise. The lady who plays the captain's motherly wife also does very commendably. But it is hard to discover just what impression the writer of this photoplay desired to create. He has shown the easy-going old captain as compelled to step out and give room to a younger man, efficient and capable when he's sober, who makes the deck most emphatically alive. This young captain gets drunk and piles up his ship in a storm, and this makes the old man's dismissal sadder. Now, in order to show the quality of this character's soul, the scenario writer has made trouble follow the ship's owner fast and faster, and he is shown at length as starving. All these things are possible, but they are not the natural consequences of anything shown in the drama, and criticize the owner, if he is the typical owner, unjustly. Therefore we are compelled to see the old captain's story as partly typical and partly improbable. This is the picture's great weakness. It is more noticeable because a true and typical picture of the old captain's dismissal would have been as important as any picture could be. The scene where the old captain feeds the one-time owner is not well acted. It is impossible to picture a realistic shipwreck. This film doesn't attempt it, but its picture of seas breaking on rocks doesn't succeed in making us fear.

"Money to Burn" (Edison).—It was the dream of a tramp, a very true and typical tramp, that gave him money to burn. The picture would have been more amusing if it had been shown, in some way, that it really was a dream—it looks merely like a very improbable reality in the tramp's experience as shown, until the officer raps his shoes as he lies asleep.

"The Unfinished Letter" (Edison).—A man in an office begins a love letter after a conversation with his darky janitor. The janitor has shown him a photograph which this reviewer thought, at first, was of a white woman, the business man's wife. The reviewer also thought that the letter was the business man's own. It really was to the janitor's black lady love. The man left it unfinished on his desk and his wife came in and saw it. This furnished the situation. When the darky came for his letter, the photograph was shown again, but this time near enough so that the reviewer could see that it was not of a white woman. By that time this reviewer also understood the situation.

"At the Gringo Mine" (Essanay).—The photography of this picture is not up to the standard; there is not enough detail. The picture seems largely black shadow and white light. It is an exciting melodrama and in its tense scene, four rough miners, during a strike, have tied the owner and foreman back to back and placed a heavy charge of dynamite under them. Meanwhile, they struggle with each other around the electric battery that will discharge it. The heroine, the owner's daughter and the foreman's sweetheart, is meanwhile on her way galloping to save them. In the struggle of the miners, the dynamite is exploded accidentally and they think that the deed, so horrible that it started them fighting, is done. The girl, however, has cut the men lose in time and they are safe. The incident has made all hands tolerant and the miners ask for pardon which the owner grants. The love story ends as usual. The acting was largely conscious of the camera, but the picture gets over fairly well.

"The Switchman's Tower" (Edison).—It is a living photograph that opens this strong and wholly praiseworthy picture of a noble, human act—indeed, what the switchman did was as fine a deed of heroism as was ever done. Such a picture as this is a rebuke to much that is thrown upon the screen. Is it the photoplay's first business to show us that men and women can be base, criminal, fugitives from justice or that men can be human and are so, once in awhile? One wonders whether the people really prefer a picture like this or one that is well entitled, "The Fugitive's Second Crime." "The Switchman's Tower" is no sentimental picture, nor is it a picture of angels, it is full of human truth. It's a picture of railroad life, and much more interesting than the man chase pictures. The characters are all clear cut and realistic. Herbert Prior, one of the most competent photoplayers in the business, is the switchman; Mary Fuller plays his wife and the engineer is James Gordon. The switchman's little girl (Edna May Weick) also deserves praise. The acting of all, including the fireman, is perfect and the settings could hardly be improved. The camera man always has just enough of the engine or train or whatever to make a perfect background and he manages to catch the very life of every scene, except—to be painfully exact—just one; it fills only a foot or two of the reel, when the switchman is looking out of the tower while his wife is taking with the engineer.

"Out of the Shadow" (Biograph).—It is the freshly charming acting and the perfect photography of pretty scenes and costumes that make this society drama acceptable. The story would be pleasing, too, if it hung together, but it most certainly does not. The producer's failure to make the story hang together doesn't keep it from being convincing as a whole. The skill he has shown in selecting players to present the different characters and the sincere acting of these players only serve to make a glaring spectacle of the picture's great shortcoming. The man's wife is moping for her dead baby and it happens that he meets another young woman, emancipated but very attractive. Her growing power over him is understandable. The wife wakes up to the situation when it seems too late. The climax comes at a dance (a beautiful scene) and it is here that the story falls down. The hostess who gives the dance knows the situation. The wife comes and is received. The husband comes with the other woman and is admitted—just think of it. Of course this reviewer cannot affirm that they would be turned away, but he doesn't think that the hostess would hold out her hand to them. In coming together, the two showed more brass than fate usually gives to two individuals. The acting of the whole picture, with no break, is very fine indeed. The young wife is the "little school teacher" of a former picture; one might call her the Maud Adams of the photoplay screen. Very commendable is the acting of the interloper also, and the girl friend of the wife's. In the scene where she stands smiling at the worried interloper her work is very commendable. In fact, the whole film is full of such fine details as that little play; it shows in the producer the eye of a master scene maker.

"Strategy of Anne" (Vitagraph).—The best thing in this rather rediculous picture of a young ladies' school in the country is that, in the middle of one of its most painfully acted scenes, there is a break to show a little gem, a wedding scene, just hands; it's very good. Miss Finch, as the head of the school, has made up the character very well, including her stuffed, awkward shoulders.

"The Two Fugitives" (Essanay).—A very cheaply knocked together situation is apparent as soon as this picture gets well started. The hero of it sees in a newspaper that the Scotland Yard men know where he is and are sending a man to bring him back. He had been an embezzler, but now has a happy family growing up around him. He helps another fugitive who, when the English detective comes, takes his place and gives himself up as the embezzler.

"Red Cloud's Secret" (Essanay).—The hero of this picture is a "lunger," an Easterner who has come to the West for his health. The villain of the picture early shows his quality. Red Cloud is an Indian, starving though his limbs and face seem very well nourished. This Indian is fed by the hero, but the villain comes and knocks the bread out of his mouth and the hero, now grown well and strong, gives him a drubbing which the heroine is there to see. There are no guns used or seen in this picture. The climax, a fight for the gold mine that Red Cloud discloses to the hero, is not very convincing; it is too plainly "nursed." This fight is cumulative; first the Indian fights with the villain, then the heroine comes and takes a hand. She sends the horse with a message in his bridle for the hero. The horse shys at the camera, but reaches the hero who soon appears on the scene of the fight. He and the villain fight for the mine like chimpanzees and, in a lull, the Indian throws the villain over the cliff and goes over with him, ending the contest. The final scene showing the result of this fall to the rocky stream below is very ugly. One wonders why this picture was produced or whether it will pay ever in money.

"A Passing Fancy" (Gaumont).—There are in this film many very interesting and well photographed pictures of a hunt on a French preserve. The story has for its human setting the meet of a fashionable hunting club. There's a picture of the start from the club house, one of the hounds, a big pack, being brought to the scent. Also we see the quarry, a herd of deer, winding the danger and making off over the field of bracken and the hounds in full cry and a scene in which the deer have taken to the water into which the hounds have followed them. The picture is notable because of these pictures, not for its story which, though well acted, is neither fresh enough nor typical enough to be important to humanity at large. It is an unusually acceptable picture.

"Winter Flowers" (Gaumont).—The value of this interesting picture is lessened by the fact that the pictures are of cut flowers and not of flowering plants. They are said to be winter flowers, but violets will hardly appeal to American spectators as being such. The sprigs include among other plants, pine, cylamen, mimosa, eucalyptus and ashbarberry. The tints are not very bright.

"The Hundred Dollar Bill" (Vitagraph).—Bunny is the rich man of this picture who in a mellow mood gives the hundred dollar bill to the poor bencher. It is a peculiarly jolly, Bunny quality of mellowness that makes the picture delightfully funny. After we've seen the pictures of hard luck we are shown Bunny leaving the place where he has been dining with some friends. A titter of pleasure ripples over the audience as he rises, and it breaks out all over the house as he makes his way out and heavily, as he is, begins to navigate the rolling sidewalk. It's a human picture, for it gets hold of the sympathies as well as makes laughter. He takes the bencher home and gives him the bill that gets him into trouble from which Bunny later rescues him.

"A Raging Sea" (Pathe).—In this film the operator has caught the sea in some interesting moods. In one series of pictures the waves, are seen breaking over the bow of the vessel and dashing the spray high up on the bridge. Then the scene changes and the sunset is seen breaking fitfully through the clouds, while the huge rollers sweep sullenly by, depicting the ocean in one of its most threatening moods. The first series is made from the bridge of a steamship and some idea of the size and might of the waves can be obtained by the comparison with the bow of the boat as it cleaves its way through them. The entire picture is one to be commended. Only an artist could have recorded such an interpretation of the sea's changing moods.

"The New Manager" (Essanay).—In this film is shown a romance of the business world. The owner of a business dies and the son discharges the old manager, substituting a new one. The old manager is left some money in his old employer's will, which he invests to such good advantage that he shortly becomes wealthy. His daughter is sent to Europe to be educated. Upon her return she meets the young man and they fall in love at first sight. But her father speedily puts a stop to that when he tells her that this was the young man who discharged him. The next turn in fortune's wheel shows the young man bankrupt and at the sheriff's sale the old manager buys the factory and everything else. But it seems he has rather admired the young man and after humiliating him a bit he returns him the business and gives him his daughter's hand as well.

"The Liar" (Pathe).—A romance of the olden time when men were condemned to death for stealing is given in this film. Through jealousy one man accuses another of attempting to steal his purse. He is given a farcical trial and is condemned to death, but his sweetheart whom he was defending from kidnapping manages to set him free and all ends happily, with the villain properly punished. The mechanical work compensates for whatever weaknesses the story may possess.

"The Two-Gun Man" (Essanay).—It was rather difficult to follow and understand this picture of the Western country. The most that could be made out of it was the fact that a certain large ranch company wanted a squatter removed from their property. They employed a two-gun man to kill him, but because of the intervention of the ranchman's daughter the murderer was induced to go away. The squatter, not knowing this, meets him and wounds him in the arm, but the girl appears on the sceen at the opportune moment, explains the situation, and the men shake hands, good friends.

"An Indian's Appreciation" (Lubin).—Here is jealousy over a girl, the gratitude of an Indian boy for kindness shown, a holdup by Indians, with an attack by cowboys and the near stringing up of a cowboy, who was responsible for all the trouble. He was driven away in disgrace and the field was left clear for the other cowboy to win the girl's favor.

"The Struggle for Life" (Eclipse).—The feature of this film is the struggle on the cliff. The trouble is jealousy. The young woman repulses the dissolute Jose, accepting the attention of an artist. The defeated man determines to remove all opposition and changes places with the driver of a coach in which the couple take passage. In a lonely place a struggle takes place on the brow of a cliff, over which Jose is ultimately hurled. That struggle is realistic and exciting. The rest is commonplace.

"On the Coast of Bengal" (Eclipse).—Here is an interesting travelog reproducing characteristic scenes from the varied and strange life of that part of the world. The operator did his work well and the selections were made with extreme care. In addition there are some attractive landscapes which afford a good idea of the scenery. It is well worth while as an educational film.

"The Spinster's Marriage" (Pathe).—The story of what happened when a fine was imposed upon bachelors and spinsters. The homeliest spinster decides to marry rather than pay the fine. Her subsequent experiences, telling how she finally chose between a tall man and a dwarf will furnish amusement for any audience.

.."Working Elephants" (Pathe).—An industrial film illustrating how elephants work after they have been trained. It is an interesting subject and one little known in this part of the world.

"She Came, She Saw, She Conquered" (Vitagraph).—Perhaps this film will remind older people of the days in the country school when it was quite the fashion to throw men teachers outdoors just for sport. This had been done in a certain district a number of times when a little woman appears on the scene. That feazes the boys for a time and before they can collect themselves they are under control by sheer domination of will. A little love affair creeps in and there is an attempt to punish one of the boys through jealousy, but ultimately the teacher fools them all by resigning and leaving with her sweetheart. The character drawing is excellent and there is much good acting in the picture.

"Blue Wing and the Violinist" (Pathe).—A traper, captured by the Indians, succeeds in charming them with the notes of his violin. Before very long he is on his way back to civilization with Blue Wing, the belle of the tribe. But she finds that civilization does not bring her happiness. She is left to wander back to her tribe alone, with the exception of the little one she carries with her. It is an emphasized example of the dangers of such alliances.

"American Field Artillery Maneuvers" (Pathe).—An excellent reproduction of the movements of a field battery in drill is presented on this film. It is one of those pictures which arouse the pride of Americans everywhere. It brings to them some indication of what their army is doing and never fails to please. Military or naval pictures always have a degree of interest which is possessed by no other films shown.

"The Clown's Best Performance" (Vitagraph).—One of the world's best short stories—"Boum-Boum," by the French academician, Jules Claratie—furnished the idea for this very emotional picture. The little boy who loved the clown was so sick that they couldn't get him to take his medicine. In his delirium, he kept asking for the clown. His parents didn't know what it was he wanted. They bought a clown doll, but it wouldn't do. Then the mother remembered that the boy had loved "Boum-Boum," the famous clown, and the father went to Boum-Boum's sumptuous home and the clown consented to come. The child was awakened from the fatal lethargy by the clown's best performance. The picture of the clown at the child's bedside is made very effective. He is dressed as in the curcus. The contrast, heightened by the anxiety that the woman who plays the mother, pictures nobly, seems to get hold of some of the deep things of life. It seemed to move the spectators strongly. This picture is more than merely acceptable.

"Christian and Moor" (Edison).—A thoroughly romantic and historically impossible incident is pictured in this very poorly acted play. Herbert Prior is far from his best as the Christian knight, who, though he wore a crowned helmet, didn't show at any time during the picture a single gesture of truly kingly or truly knightly command, but presented the part as a rather unpleansantly love-sick modern man. The Christian soldiers this knight brought to the heroine's rescue were very much like theatrical policemen. The Moors were better, especially the white-robed emir. The settings were not carefully chosen, and the picture is not important.

Scene from "The Regeneration of Apache Kid"—Selig Release for August 15.

"An Up-to-Date Elopement" (Pathe).—It was something of a surprise to see this picture, which is so much like the rarebit pictures of years ago. It is a vulgar farce, the most amusing part of which is a rediculous wheelbarrow-automobile, such as may be seen in many a "pop" vaudeville show. Its lack of refinement might have been partially excusable if it had been at all funny, but it isn't.

"In Switzerland" (Pathe).—On the same reel with the above, this beautiful and very interesting travelog seems out of place. Those who are sure to like this very much are likely to dislike the other as heartily. These views of Lake Lucerne and of the assent of Mt. Rigi are fresh and worth while.

"The Zylras" (Pathe).—The Zylras are two acrobats. There is nothing wonderful about their performance. The picture is not very valuable.

"A Fair Exchange" (Selig).—A situation fresh in moving pictures gives life to this sprightly melodrama. The heroine; a fine horsewoman, after a hard chase captures the bandit's sweetheart and she is rewarded by being able to write to the bandit in substance: "You have my lover, I have your sweetheart; let's exchange." The exchange is promptly made. To this reviewer it seemed that there was a good deal of business in the very early part of this picture that didn't justify itself. It opened with a conversation that the spectators had no means of understanding. It seemed also that the relationship of the players—the judge with his son, also the relationship of the bandit brothers should have been made clear sooner. The failure to make this reviewer early understand these relationships left some confusion in his mind until as the situation progresses it becomes all clear and plain. This momentary confusion was not sufficient to spoil the pleasure that the play and its happy ending give.

"Slick's Romance" (Selig).—Not only is this good picture well conducted and (for the most part) convincing, but many surprisingly good things are in it. The producer shows, for instance, a faculty of utilizing, in a scene, a wide background with mountains in the distance, yet holding it well in hand so that two or three players may be photographed in it without being lost or over-emphasized. He does it by using a few trees as a screen that hides nothing, yet sets the figures out. The story is what may be called a realistic romance, the love-story of a cowboy and a very pretty and ladylike waitress. The cowboy, who has come to town with a bunch of cattle, saves the waitress from being insulted. Because of the resulting fight in the restaurant, the waitress is discharged and the cowboy finds her at her home. Her mother has consumption, which gives a very convincing reason for bringing the heroine out to the range, so that the love-story, with its elemental-hearted villain, can be made real. The acting of the whole cast is fine. We see, as the story is unrolled, not only good acting on the part of the heroine, hero and villain, but the old ranch owner, or some of the minor characters doing some human thing as simply as nature itself. The loves scenes are all as fresh as spring daisies. "Poker Ed's" attitude toward the engagement of the hero and the heroine, when it is reported to him in the saloon, is worthy of special notice even in a play as wholly good as this. The characters also looked very much like their parts. Slick, the hero, is a manly looking man; Tillie, the heroine, a charming, simple, young girl; Hoover, the ranch owner is prosperous looking and well content with life. There is only one point which is possibly a slight blemish. The object of the scenario writer seemed to be to make a romantic impression convincing as real life and he has added bits of realism here and there to keep its feet on the ground. One of these is Tillie's drunken father. He soon dropped out of the picture and it is doubtful whether his presence did any good at all. It is usually safer to protect the heroine from drunken fathers and convict brothers, unless the picture is to show the strength of love as able to break through even such hindrances.

"The New Officer" (Lubin).—The new officer was proud of being one of the force, but his actual experiences on his first day of duty were not at all like his dream of what they were going to be. His falling asleep and letting the tramp take the coat and hat from under him doesn't convince us enough to be funny; but the use that the tramp made of the uniform is very amusing as being an exaggerated criticism of some of the practices of "our finest."

"The Beautiful Voice" (Biograph).—The actor who hears the beautiful voice singing behind the blinds and buys offerings of flowers, candy and, later, gems to show its effect upon his affectionate heart, is competent and his work in this picture is very acceptable. Of course, the owner of the voice was to be an old maid with a homely face, but when we learn that the voice was in a phonograph, we lose our sympathy somewhat. Was it desirable to have the phonograph make the sweet music? It was tougher to the man, of course, but one feels that he thoroughly deserved it, under the present circumstances.

"Mr. Beach Goes Calling" (Biograph).—The first part of this comedy-picture has humanity enough to awaken sympathy in the audience; but for the ending, with the entrance of the burglar, is not so closely in touch with ordinary experiences and not nearly so funny. The first part was delightful and well acted; the second half was hard to act and served mostly to lengthen the film. The first part is good enough to make the film acceptable; it was worth while.

"Over the Garden Wall" (Kalem).—It was this reviewer's impression that several times in this romantic comedy, what may be called the picture's humanity was sacrificed to making it funny. Were not the letter from the young girl (niece of the old maid who lived over the wall) and the young clubman's reply, which he supposed was to reach a woman much older than himself, out of character? They were very ill-bred letters for young people to write to older people and didn't heighten our sympathy for them. Later, when the two have become friends and, as the leader says, "more than friends," his puppy and her kitten are before them and each lifts one of them up. In the hero, that way of expressing affection for his puppy seemed not quite masculine. The picture was not always convincing enough to be interesting, nor was the photography always good. In the second scene it was poor.

"Love in the Hills" (Essanay).—There are some well photographed scenes of forest trees and a country pool, in which the heroine is wading barefoot, on this film, and these make pleasing pictures. The story is a comedy.

Independent

"The Lineman" (Imp).—One of the first things noticeable in this picture is that the photography has little depth. The melodrama, which pictures burglars breaking in a lonely house in the country, and the wife, with only a child to help her, telephoning to the husband in the city, held markedly the attention of two young women seated in front of this reviewer, and apparently of the whole audience. The reviewer noticed that the two in front of him looked away from the picture to laugh with each other when the face of the husband at the telephone, after the lineman has cut in, is shown. That scene seemed much overacted. The lineman who has cut into the wire adds much to the intensity of the situation. He perplexes both man and wife by keeping them from talking to each other, and in the end rescues the woman. The acting is good.

"Alone in the World" (Ambrosio).—It was a manly little lad who was alone in the world. He applied for a job to the miller, and we see an artistic picture of the mill; to the smith, and we have a very commendable picture of the smithy, in a reddish tint; it is looking out through the open door. The boy can get work at neither place, so he appeals to the king. This scene is not so artistically grouped as the four or five preceding scenes, nor is the scene where the boy dies, having followed the soldiers to the war, very artistic; but an angel comes, melts into the picture, and has very beautifully photographed white draperies. The angel takes the boy in her arms and with him melts out of the picture, and we see him carrying the boy to his mother among the clouds. The white draperies of the four or five angels shown in the last scene are very beautiful against the dark cloudy background. It makes a very acceptable film.

"Old Peddler" (Imp).—Fine and fresh ideas are not very common. In a motion picture a fresh idea or a fresh observation will go a good way toward making it acceptable, even when, as in this case, the picture is conducted in a disjointed way. This picture tells the story of a little boy's escapade. He had made friends with an old peddler and had gone to visit him while his nurse slept. This caused much anxiety to his parents and brought out the police. Some of the incidents on the boy's way home are not at all convincing. The producer has made the old peddler bring in the lost boy wrapped up in the rubber cloth used for protecting his wares. This was a grave surprise to the audience. The peddler and the boy are the chief characters and the former is beyond praise as a picture of a kindly-hearted Jew; the boy also is commendable. The greatness of a picture depends more upon the art of the producer than upon the author of the plot. Occasionally we run across a picture that holds the attention, often wins applause, although based on the most simple incident of daily life. The director has lived the part and supplied the little things which make it appear real.

"The Sorrowful Mother" (Eclair).—Perhaps the camera man could have made more artistic pictures of the rocky glen and the falls. It was to this wild glen that the passionate sailor took the lad and bound him, in order to compel the widowed mother to accept him as her husband. The boy breaks his way out of the fishing net in which the man had tied him and runs home to his mother. The neighbors also rush in and arrest the violent man, so the mother was not sorrowful long.

"Too Much Swedish Drill" (Eclair).—The spectators laughed when this picture was being projected every time the man who had been induced to practice the Swedish exercises knocked over a vase or pulled down a bracket or, while running through the street, knocked over some passer. It is a horseplay picture of the usual kind among imported films.

"The Cattle Rustler's End" (American).—Here is a lively Western story with cattle rustling, furious riding by cowboys, a love tale and other interesting and altogether strong features introduced. The cowboys take the wrong man for the rustler and are about to deal out summary justice, but the girl, in keeping her tryst at the lone tree, discovers the real rustler and informs her father and the boys. They go to the tree and catch the man red handed. Then the girl demands as a reward that she be allowed to marry the man of her choice and her father grants it amid the plaudits of the crowd.

"The End of the Trail" (Nestor).—Here is an old theme effectively handled and made interesting. It is the old story of a rival arranging matters so that another was deceived and left the girl he loved. She, piqued, marries the rival. After a few years he tires of her and leaves her penniless, going to the West where he hears his former rival has been successful. After his arrival they are attacked by a band of hostile Indians and in the fight he is mortally wounded. Before he dies he confesses his duplicity. The former lover starts immediately for the East, arriving in time to prevent the woman and her baby from being turned out of doors and then bringing her back to his own home in the West. The acting is good and there is the glamour of the Nestorian photography to make the picture still more striking. It holds the attention throughout.

"The Dubuque Regatta" (Champion).—Here is a good scenic, showing the interesting features of a regatta at Dubuque. The photography is well done and the picture is full of life and animation.

"When Reuben Came to Town" (Solax).—Reuben is played by a capable actor and many of the scenes of this farce are very funny—it certainly kept the spectators laughing clear through. Reuben, very much the clown, is taken by his mother to visit rich relatives in New York City, a few buildings of which are not very well shown. Reuben's antics make the play. The chief fault with the picture, which, funny as it is, kept it from being possibly much more funny, is that Reuben's mother and lady cousin, through a large part of the film, were present without acting. Two people couldn't sit at the table with Reuben and his cousin's husband carrying on so and not notice it—could hardly sit there without laughing. If something was going on so funny that the whole audience was laughing why should not the other actors be amused; they were pictured as also present? They didn't even smile, most of the time.

"If One Could See Into the Future" (Ambrosio).—Some time ago this company released an extremely poetic picture entitled "The Snow Maiden." It seems not improbable that the same author and producer built this picture; but though it is a fantasy in some ways like the former, it has a very different, a brutal quality and is very much poorer art. In the first place the idea behind it is pessimistic—not quite normal. It is usually left for some officious idiot to comfort a mother's grief by telling her that if her child had lived he might when he had grown up have been a cause of grief to her. The picture of Father Time's big clock room is as unreal as somebody else's dream; yet it was a very good idea to show the pictures that the mother saw, under a thin film of rippling water—the effect is weird. These brutal scenes, which were shown as possibilities, comforted the mother, so the picture shows, and made her glad that her boy lay dead. She wanted him dead.

"Mr. Baumgarten is Elected Deputy" (Ambrosio).—If this film has actually passed the Board of Censorship, the latter needs a censor worse than the pictures. A more disgusting and stupid thing than this alleged comedy has never traveled across a moving picture screen. The title is absolutely misleading and a positive imposition both upon public and exhibitor. It would lead one to believe that it was some sort of an American farce, while, as a matter of fact, it is nothing but an impossible caricature of human life. The scene is laid in Italy or France. A plot is conspicuous by its total absence and the titles shed no light on it. This is one of the titles: "M. Baumgarten, candidate to revolutionary deputy." How clear and plain that is to an American audience. The chief actor invites all sorts of disreputable male characters into his house and encourages them to make free with his wife. The finale shows the interior of the man's house and a most ostentiously intoxicated crowd of men and women sinking slowly into a drunken stupor. Such things are nothing more and nothing less than a fraud on the exhibitor and should be suppressed.

"Dark Feather, the Squaw" (Bison).—Although this picture is in a series which has been in many cases very truly instructive, it has nothing new as a story, adds nothing to our knowledge of Indian tradition, life or customs and is artistically not worthy a place with the best of its predecessors. It is well known that Indian men are scantily clad; but it is strange that intelligent film makers, who expect or hope that refined men and women will accept their pictures, should let, as the Bison Company has in this case, a picture of a struggle remain on a reel when one of the men fighting is left almost naked and in the presence of the heroine. One might almost prophesy that the Bison Company will find it hard to recover what this one picture will cost it.

"The Call of the Song" (Imp).—One or two pretty scenes, one or two passages where the acting of the heroine is charming, will hardly keep this picture from being a failure. With the exception of the heroine, her mother and perhaps her girl friend, the characters are not very well chosen. The rural characters, the girl's father and men of the village, are with no exception plainly artificial. The story is commonplace. The country hero in the city forgets his first love; but when the city girl, who was engaged to him, scorns him, he comes back to his first love, comes to her in the attitude of a real hero back from the wars. The song that reminded him of this first love isn't worth putting into a picture play. This song, when the man sings it again to the heroine, recalls her to her senses, for she had gone mad. When she realizes things again, she falls into his arms.

"Truth Shall Prevail" (Yankee).—In this picture one employee is wrongfully accused of a crime and suffers the penalty. The guilty one is hurt and the accused boy's mother befriends him. He confesses. The accused young man is released from jail and reinstated with the firm in a better position. The confession causes the real culprit's arrest and punishment, notwithstanding the pleas of those who attempt to save him from his crime's consequences.

"Mutt and Jeff Get Passes" (Nestor).—There is some fun surely in this picture of how Jeff got a free ticket to a baseball game; but there is much that is not amusing in it. This reviewer fails to find among habitues of the picture shows any great enthusiasm for this series of pictures and most people seem to have been made weary by the very silly actions of Mutt.

"The Burglar and the Girl" (Great Northern).—Good acting and the brisk pace of its scenes make this story which, as shown, is quite impossible, fairly good entertainment. It is not a drama, but a series of scenes picturing the life of an escaped convict. He commits another robbery and then, though he still carries his burglar's kit, has, it is said, reformed. He falls in love, and in a dramatic final scene heroically acknowledges that he is a burglar and uses the tools that are in his bag to save a child shut in a big safe. This scene is surely worth while.

"An Elopement by Aeroplane" (Lux).—These two lovers really get away from the indignant and watchful papa in an aeroplane. It is too bad that, since the producer had the big flying machine and could catch a view of the heroine getting away in it, that he didn't take a few more precautions not to have workmen in the picture who were not actors. This picture's scenes, showing the full grown heroine being locked up in the house, and the inspection of the doors, were not effective. The chase of the hero by the bulldog was far from realistic. The pictures of the aeroplane in the air and the flight of the heroine are interesting; they are not dramatic.

"Dewey" (Champion).—The love story of Admiral Dewey's son is told in this picture, which the producer made more amusing than he intended. The time is just before the Spanish War. The heroine's father is a very unpatriotic Senator who wants her to marry not young Dewey, but a Spanish nobleman. The Admiral himself comes into the picture to plead his son's cause, but the Senator is obdurate. The grandee also is present at this interview and proposes a toast to Spain, which the Admiral won't drink. He then proposes a toast to "Yankee Pigs"; the Admiral gives him a piece of his mind. Young Dewey comes back from the wars with honors and is then accepted by the heroine, with the father's consent. The butler of the Senator, who also went to the front, comes back with a commissioned officer's uniform and marries the Senator's sister. This last was brought about by the good offices of Col. Roosevelt. If the picture had been dignified enough, it would have been open to criticism, on the grounds that it used the names of public men and the effigy of a great admiral in a picture that is not at all historical or true. Such a practice is one way of attracting unfavorable advertising. It will hardly do so in this case; the picture is, artistically, too undignified.

"Tables Turned" (Bison).—A drama of human beings who happen to be Westerners is presented in this film. The usual trite, oh, so trite, trimmings of the typical Western melodrama (the man chase, the bar-room or gambling-den scene, the gun play, the hanging or rescue from hanging and the outlaw marriage) are happily wanting, or at least not accented, in it. Nevertheless it is a melodramatic picture of typically Western life, or it is artfully made convincing as such by the handling of the scenes. The heroine's father, in the power of the villain, tries to discredit the hero as a horse thief, but the tables are turned. The photography is very good and there is one excellent moonlight scene where the horse thieves are followed and recognized.

"His Son'l" (Reliance).—In this picture there is very little that we have not seen before. This would be not a criticism but praise, if it were presented freshly or if the object in making the picture had been to give another individual's view of the old situation. The picture is not fresh either in its acting or in its incidents. The father steals because his family is starving and vainly, the wife is dead before he can get the food to her. This is the picture's one strong point; this part is very well acted, indeed, and very commendable. One of Stephen Phillips' poems pictures a like situation and it will be pictured again and again and by great writers as they come. The father goes to prison. It seemed to be a ten dollar bill that he snatched, and his term was about twenty years. He returned the change to the grocer; all he got was an armful of food. The rest of the picture is about as probable as this long term and makes scenes very hard to act sincerely. To put the Reliance stock company to picturing scenes like some of these seems a waste of good talent.

"The Evening Bells" (Itala).—The photography in this picture is not up to the usual Itala standard; it spoiled the effect of some of the pictures. It is well acted. The hero, as a child, helps his father ring the Angelus bells and when he has grown to be a man, while burglarizing a neighboring house, he hears the bells his old father is ringing alone and repents. It is shown that the father has asked the Virgin to turn his son from evil paths. One of the picture's shortcomings is that burglars usually work at midnight, while the evening bells ring earlier. Also the evil men are shown breaking into the house and this itself will forbid the pictures being shown in some cities.

"A Trio of Acrobats" (Itala).—On the same reel with "The Evening Bells" we have this picture of some wonderful acrobatic work. Two women and a man are the performers. This reviewer has never seen acrobatic feats that come up to these on this film.

"The Judge's Story" (Thanhouser).—One little bit is worth special notice in this not important picture; it is the Thanhouser Kid's little nigger boy. She's the only real nigger in the picture. The story as shown is not convincing and the war scenes are not realistic. Especially artificial and unpleasantly theatrical is the captain's entrance into the room where his own mother lie dying. He had to be invited in—just think of it. On his way back to the camp it was the nigger boy's heroism that saved his life. When the captain, now a judge, tells this story to a jury, the old darky, seemingly older than the judge though he wasn't more than seven when the judge first saw him, is acquitted of a crime he didn't commit. The dying victim of a murderer had accused him of doing the deed. One doesn't know what a good lawyer would say to the verdict, but it was justice. As for the Thanhouser Kid's acting, it has an astonishing quality. A few days ago we saw her as the little lame boy in her company's very beautiful "Pied Piper." There is no relationship between him and this nigger boy; they are separate individualities. Either Marie Eline has a marvelous pliancy and ability to accept the suggestions and ideas of the pictures' producer or she has incomprehensible springs of wisdom. A child like her has no self-conscious experience, nor any story to tell the world by means of her acting. She is merely a mirror reflecting equally well apparently whatever character is brought before it. The faculty of reflecting character thus is histrionic genius. In good acting always both player and audience are spectators. The player is more so than the audience, for the audience is permitted to feel emotions while the powerful player remains as cold as silvered glass. It may be that Marie Eline has some of that incomprehensible but invaluable gift, true genius.

"The Artist Financier" (Rex).—An interesting scene opens this picture whose reason of being, it seems, was to use the possibility of knowing what a man says by watching his lips although out of hearing, to give a fresh and therefor interesting denouement to a story. After the first scenes, the picture shows unnecessary amateurishness in the way it is conducted. Skipping over the usual scene where the indignant father dismisses the would-be son-in-law (these scenes must be realistic, for they are always the same from Vitagraph pictures down) we see the artist-hero on the opposite side of a river from the heroine's home. He is looking at her through a surveyors' transit (only an engineer would know that the picture of the girl as shown was not seen through any transit) and he gets the idea from that of finishing her portrait by means of a telescope. This telescope scene is very amateurish. What is worse, the producer has permitted us to use the artist's eye and see what he saw through the glass—we see the girl seated on the bench under the trees with the river behind her, not between her and the artist. Perhaps the camera man when he took this view was too lazy to cross the river to take the picture from the artist's side so he took it looking across the heroine at the artist. The heroine's father comes into the scene and, through the telescope, the artist sees his lips and gets a secret that makes him rich. The closing scenes of the picture are very commendable, especially is the barefoot girl. There's a fine bit of character in that detail.

"Red Cloud's Devotion" (Bison).—A very pretty and also educational story of Indian life and charcter is given in this film. Little Star, the heroine, whose sick father and mother are cured by the white doctor, doesn't convince an Easterner that she pictures an Indian girl so truthfully as does her jealous lover, Red Cloud; particularly in his attitude toward this doctor while Little Star loves him and in his gratitude to the doctor perhaps mostly because the doctor had refused Little Star's love. The picture is educational in its showing the attitude of Little Star toward her fevered parents, her gathering twigs and leaves of growing plants and her prayer for help to the Great Spirit upon the high rocks in the pale moonlight. This makes a very pretty scene, after her prayer with upheld hands, she scatters to the four winds the basket of living twigs which she had picked for this purpose. Many of the other scenes are pretty. As a dramatic composition, the picture has several minor faults. The old Indian and his squaw who were sick were quite plainly white and should have been kept within the tepee. Little Star should have noticed the white men's tent before she almost stumbled over it. It would have been better if the chief had showed us why he was in such a hurry to take the band away. Was he afraid of contagion? If so, it would have been interesting.

"Back to Nature" (Thanhouser).—In choosing his scenes, the producer of the Thanhouser Company shows a quick appreciation of the truly poetic. The truth of his dooryard scene in this picture—the chickens, nanny goat and particularly the line of burdock leaves—catches a homely beauty that goes straight home to the heart. The picture is really more the poetic day-dream of some overworked bookkeeper than a truthful picture of life; yet it so truthfully pictures a human heart's longing that it gets over effectively. Indeed, this reviewer will be much mistaken if many, many city people who see the picture won't sincerely thank the Thanhouser Company for it. It is supposed to be an elderly clerk who is discharged to make room for a younger man who takes his family—whom the city is not using well—to a farm in the country, where he and the whole family make good and find friends and happiness. The acting of all hands is good. In the early scenes little Marie Elain, as the sick child, was unable to repress her vitality, signs of which peeped through her acting again and again.

TOLEDO.

On a recent visit to Toledo, one of the representatives of the Moving Picture World dropped into the various down-town theaters and found them all thriving and doing a prosperous business. Toledo theaters on the whole are very well advanced in projection, and the writer was trated to some real pleasing exhibitions while there. The Empress, Colonial and Princess are the leading houses, and all report a splendid business for the summer. Mr. Bernard Gardner, manager of the Empress, has installed a large cooling plant and an Aeolian pipe organ, and several other novelties for a picture theater. The house is one of the prettiest in the State. All the managers in Toledo are interested in the Moving Picture World and scan its pages each week for the real live moving picture news.

For $140 a week we publish for manufacturers 4000 copies of a bulletin, 8 pages, 6x9. This figure covers stamps, envelopes, printing, editing, mailing, clerical work, ad writing, etc.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

SAN FRANCISCO OPERATORS SEND CONGRATULATIONS.

Editor Moving Picture World

Dear Sir: Noting that you have at last absorbed the last of your imitators and that you now stand openly, where those who have known you best have always known, the ONLY publication in the business, and also noting that certain advertisers have returned to you after staying away for awhile, I beg to say to you that you have the hearty congratulations, and the best wishes of this body of men, who very much admire the stand you have always taken for the improvment, the advancment and the RIGHT of the business regardless of whose toes you may have trod upon, and we trust that the coming times will prove of prosperity to you, as well as to those interests you so ably advance.

We also request that you will convey to Mr. Richardson our thanks for many favors shown and tell him that his fight for those things that are to the good in the often neglected end of the game, the operating ROOM (not box, coop or booth) will continue, and that he will always find strong support in this local.

Again complimenting you, and with best regards I beg to remain, Sincerely yours,

W. G. Woods, Prest.

[Thanks, Bro. Woods. If there is one body of men in the business whom we respect as individuals and value their opinion it is Local 16 of the I. A. T. S. E.—Ed. M. P. W.]

THE CENSORS AND "THE NUN."

To the Editor:

Sir—The letter from the secretary of the board of censors disclaiming any responsibility for passing the film of "The Nun," is one of the best explanations that does not explain it is possible to read. The labored suggestion that whatever trespasses upon the question of denomination or sect is carefully avoided is exceedingly weak. The breaking of the Crucifix in "The Nun" is not an incident calling for the denunciation by the Roman Catholic Church alone, it is offensive to all churches in the entire world; indeed it touches Christendom and therefore civilization everywhere. If in a play, the English flag had been torn to shreds would the censors say such an act does not concern us in America, would their judgment be sound? What if an American flag had been so desecrated, would it not have become the duty of the censors to at once prevent the representation of so flagrant a crime?

What the flag is to a country the crucifix is to civilization and to pass the breaking of it as being offensive—if offensive at all—to only one party is a piece of Pilate like indifference which is both inexcusable and unpardonable.

Yours truly,

AN INTERESTED ONE.

CORRECT YOUR MAIL LIST.

Editor Moving Picture World,

Dear Sir:—For the benefit of numerous manufacturers and renters who have been addressing mail matter to Wilson & Reiser, also to Wilson & Clow, also to Wilson & Fisher, all as proprietors of the Family Theater, I wish to inform them that there is but one theater in Oberlin and that is the Family Theater, which is now owned by Martin & Broadwell, who took possession last month.

Very respectfully yours,

Oberlin, O. F. L. WILSON.

"HEROIC" ACTORS PUZZLE HIM.

Ithaca, N. Y., August 7, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World,

Dear Sir:—In observing the scenes depicted in moving picture theaters in various cities, I have been puzzled by the size of the actors. Is it the purpose of the moving picture play to represent the actors of heroic size, or is it meant to represent the scenes as if actual men and women are the actors? This seems an important question from the artistic standpoint and also from the standpoint of reality.

Yours, S. H. GAGE.

HAS "SOME OPERATOR."

Penn Yan, N. Y., August 7th, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World,

Dear Sir:—The communication in your issue of Aug. 12th signed "An Old Operator" interests me, as I am fortunate in having some Operator myself and, while Mr. John North is all that is claimed for him (without doubt), I would like to show "an old operator" the pictures MY operator, Lewis Townsend, puts on. Talking pictures are unnecessary when he is at the crank; they more than talk, and no matter how bad the film happens to be, they go through without a break, and as steady as a clock.

Our No. 6 Powers has never had a break since he has had it in charge and, while he is young in years, he knows the game from A to Z, and, without disparagement to John North, I would like to put Lewis Townsend's work against him. Yours truly,

CHAS. H. SISSON,
Manager Sampson Theater.

Some very interesting experiments have been carried out by the well-known firm of E. Liesegang, of Duesseldorf, Germany, in connection with the absorption of heat in cinematograph projectors. It is claimed that a large proportion of the heat rays which pass through the condenser can be absorbed by placing in front of it and behind the film a fine metallic net. This net, being opaque, necessarily absorbs a certain amount of the light, but this loss is apparently out of proportion to the absorption of heat which it is said occurs. Herr. Liesegang also claims that a piece of film may be left exposed to the light from a 20 amp. arc for a period of three quarters of an hour without damage, when a net is interposed, although only a few seconds are needed to fire it upon the removal of the net. This check to the passage of the heat rays, so it is said, is not entirely due to the latter being directly conducted away by the net itself, since it has been found that some resistance is offered if a fine network of lines is engraved on the surface of the condenser. Herr Liesegang considers that the phenomenon is due to the greater diffractibility of the heat waves as compared to the actinic ones, and that the fineness of the lines plays a most important rôle.

The "ne plus ultra" of moving picture emporiums it can be safely ssid, has been resched hy the I'alm Garden Thester, at 1729 Carson Street. Beyond the shsdow of a doubt this theater is one of the neatest, prettiest and coziest theatres ever built for the purpose of Photoplay projection. Decorated to suit the most fastidious taste, yet with not too much ginger-bread to it, this house can he truthfully described as a veritable dream. The iobby is neatly decorated in green to harmonize with the overhanging hranches and leaves of the many palm trees that stand in a row along the balcony and lobby. At night the iobby is brilliantly lighted with 150 tungstens, which greatly sdds to its effect. The interior decorations are also of the same color, the walls being spaced off in uniform rectangles of about four to esch wall, and in the exact center of each panel a circle with the initials P. G. (Palm Garden), is artistically designed. The fioor has a gradual slope toward the curtain and the seats are so ingeniously arranged that the picture on the screen may be easily seen from any psrt of the house. The ventilating system is beyond criticism, consisting of two large ceiling fans and six smaii fans to an auditorium 20 feet high, with two iarge skylights in its service. The operating room is siso ventilated with a 24-inch exhaust fan. The throw is 110 feet on a silvered curtsin. The projection is commendable. Independent pictures from the Pittsburg Photopisy Company have been used at this house to very good business. Wm. Bernardi is the owner and manager. The operating room is equipped with two Edison one-pin machines, which are very capably managed by Gilbert Kreii, an operator of six years' experience.

On Juiy 28 at ten o'ciock a demonstration of the iatest Edison Model B. Kinetoscope was given at the offices of the Pittsburg Calcium Light and Fiim Company, of 125 Fourth Avenue. The attendance was indeed worthy of the event and more than one exhibitor went his way vowing that the next machine they bought would be an Edison type B. Kinetoscope. Bernard M. Corbett, as representative of Thos. A. Edison Inc., very effectively demonstrated that the sooner they did so the better.

The Coliseum Theater, of Southern Avenue, Mt. Oliver, is worthy of comment. The highest praise is due to its proprietor and manager, F. J. Herrington, who is also the president of The Motion Picture League of Pennsyivania. Mr. Herrington, by the way, is considered to be one of the best educated men connected with the moving picture industry, having a command of the English ianguage which would do credit to our abiest statesman. The Coliseum has a seating capacity of 440, which mskes it the iargest theater on Mt. Oiiver, and the capable management of its owner has made it a photoplay house that may be set as an example. The program, since its opening, has never been more than two reeis for a nickel, and Mr. Herrington has educated the patrons of the Coliseum so that they do not expect more than two reels. At the release of specisi war pictures, Mr. Herrington has made it a rule to always lecture on them himself. Playing-to-the-picturesmusic is very abiy performed by Mrs. Kenneth. The pictnre effects and the trap drum are realisticaily reproduced by Phii Herrington. With a twenty-foot ceiling and 10 48-inch ventiiators, this house is very cooi in summer, while a speciai heating system makes it very cozy and comfortable in the winter. One of the rules in this house is, that ladies who do not remove their hats, are allowed seats at the right of the house only, thereby making it possible for the other sex, who do remove their hats, to better view the pictures. Four double exits, rear and side, and a single exit, insures safety to patrons in case of danger. The projection department is equipped with an Edison one-pin machine, in a reguiation ashestos booth, under the able charge of Mr. Wm. Kenneth, to whose credit the exceptionai good projection should be placed. Licensed films are used.

Under the cspabie managemanship of Hsrry Rieff, the Lyric Theater, on Boggs Avenue, Mt. Washington, has been doing good business. This house has a seating capacity of 250. The program consists of three reels Licensed pictures.

It seems that quite a number of Pittsburg theater owners have summoned ancient mythology to their aid in christening their respective theaters. The Acropolis is certainly of that class, and it has been nailed on to a neat little theater in Hazlewood, under the management of its owner, Mr. Frank Adams. Mr. Adams happens to be a showmsn of twenty years' experience, being one of the first to put a vaudeviiie act in Keith & Proctor's circuit. The Acropolis seats about 300, and is very well ventiiated and equipped with necessary exits and aisies. Two Edison one-pin machines are used for projection. Until recently, Mr. Adams has been running three reels, but after an understanding with his opposition, hss changed to two, of a better grsde.

Probably one of the busiest and most progressive men in McKeesport, is Mr. H. A. Berg. Mr. Berg is the manager of the Casino Theater and the Dreamisnd, hoth of McKeesport. About two years ago he started in his csreer at the Dreamland Thester with Independent pictures, giving the pnblic a different and better show for their money, with the result that he was able to purchase the Casino Thester about three months ago, which wss owned hy Mr. Wciskercher, and after remodeling it he switched the service from Licensed to Independent, with gratifying results. The Dreamland itself has just undergone extensive alterstions, adding 200 more seats to its seating capacity, making it 550 sests.

The Dresmiand, at 125 Fifth Street, McKeesport, is considered one of the finest theaters in that town, and being the largest, the owner and manager is basking in the warmth of public patronsge and nickels. The seating cspacity is 550, arranged into four sections by three four-foot sisles. The ventilating system which has made this theater "a-first-aid-to-the-hot" establishment, consists of 20 electric fans, 4 six-mch ventiiations. Six four-foot exits also help in cooling this theater and furnish rosds to safety of no smaii degree. The musical feature consists of a pisnist of marked ability, and a trsp drum. The moving picture effects are also not overlooked and are remarkably well executed, making some of the photoplays very realistic. The operating room is of the regulation asbestos type snd is equipped with two Edison istest type B. machines. This theater is situated in the very center of the Braddock shopping district and has proved one of the most profitable motion picture enterprises in this vicinity. H. A. Berg is the msnager and proprietor. Independent service from Independent Fiim Exchange is used.

J. McCsbe Sweet, one of the charter members of the iocai I. A. T. S. E., has just returned from his rather lengthy sojourn in Uniontown. J. McCabe was the chief cook and bottie washer in the projection department at the West End Theater until about six weeks ago, when the lease changed hands. The West End, which has been using vaudeviiie and moving pictures for the last two years, will open up to the legitimate drama on or about the first of September, with the result thst J. McCabe is iooking for some piace where he can sgain hang his hat, call at the office Saturdays for his weekly compensation, and project pictures of the iet-us-iinger-ionger sort.

The Cssino, one block down from the Dreamland on Fifth Street, McKeesport, is another of the H. A. Berg enterprises, and Mr. Berg with his usuai business enterprise has snatched a victory from the very jaws of failure, for this house was being run to death or on the verge of it by its former owners, and using first run Licensed films at that. No sooner though had Mr. Berg taken hoid of it than there was a visible change. Patrons began to notice that they were receiving better treatment, and they, in approvai, repiied with their more frequent patronage. The house at present has a seating capacity of 300, is very weii ventiiated and equipped with the necessary exits. The operating room is aiso properly supplied with the essentiai projecting machinery. The projection is good. A $1,500 orchestra organ furnishes the musical feature. Independent pictures have been used at this theater since Mr. Berg has taken it in hand.

An example of what proper management msy do for a so-called "hoodoo" is pretty well illustrated by Eddie Smith, the manager-proprietor of the Crescent Theater, at 5701 Butler Street. The Crescent has changed hands aimost as many times as it has seats and Smiling Eddie is the oniy one of the bunch thst has really put it on a surenuff paying basis. The house has a sesting capacity of 150. The lobby is neatly decorated and at night an eiectrically iighted crescent with the name "CRESCENT" right beiow it iights up the iobby and the near vicinity in a way thst would do credit to a downtown theater. The projection is very good, aithough the curtain itscif is an ordinary canvas curtsin. The ventiiating appliances consist of six revolving fsns and two large windows in the rear of the house, which are always open, and including these, four iarge exits are a great aid in cooling the auditorium and at the ssme time offer ample means of exit. A continuai entertainment of three Independent reeis to an admission of oniy five cents hss proven a successfui innovation. An $850 orchestra pisno furnishes the music. Mr. Smith has been in the motion picture business with simost the very first release.

The Spot, on Beaver Avenue, has been dark for the isst two months, but it is expected to open up on or about the first of Septemher. Mr. George Hoffman is the manager and proprietor.

T. S. Miller and his compatriot, Geo. E. Moore, are still holding down their johs as shippers at The General Fiim Company, 436 Fourth Avenue, and it would be a most arduous task indeed to find two bigger hustiers in the film business.

Messrs. Warner and Davis, of the Pittsburg Photoplay Company, and the Independent Film Exchsnge, respectiveiy, are spending their dear vacation days in that slow old burg, Atlantic City, and from some of the abbreviated clauses they pen off on postcards, seems to indicate that things aren't as slow as they're supposed to be—in Philsdeiphis.

That good old scout, Kirsch, is stiii doping fiims at The General Film Company, to the satisfaction of some of the exhibitors, for Kirsch seems to use not only his heart in booking, but also his brsin. Chsrlie Miller has shown himself a very capsble assistant at every opportunity.

A serious automobile accident occurred, in which Geo. Brenneman, manager of the Cameraphone Thester on Fifth Avenue, lost his life. Mr. Brenneman, his wife, son, and mother-in-law went on a trip Sundsy, Jnly 30, through the rural districts, in a big touring car from the Brennemsn home ou Mt. Wsshington. Nearing what is known as Ford's Stop, on the Charieroi line, the machine wss going at a rapid speed. Mr. Brenneman, who was at the wheei, did not notice the approach of a Charieroi trolley car until it was too iate. The big csr crsshed into the auto, hurling it nearly sixty feet to the side of the road. Brenneman and his young son occupied the front psrt of the machine, and it was this part that was strnck. Brenneman and the boy were both thrown fuily fifty feet to the side of the track. The women and the machine landed in a heap further down the track. Brenneman was picked up unconscious and placed inside of the car with his son. The women were buried beneath the car, bnt were quickly extricated by willing hands. Brenneman was at once hnrried to the Southside Hospital, where he died several hours later without regsining consciousness. The other victims were taken to the Brenneman home, and it is said that they will recover. Mr. Brenneman was one of the most popuisr motion picture men in town, and more than one will deeply feei this bereavement. Always kind, never arrogant, the very idol of his empioyees, jovisl, free-hearted, and modest, a man with the purpose of being a man in every way, this was Mr. Geo. Brenneman.

EDDIE WHEELER.

SEATTLE.

W. G. Spurrier, formerly of the Ssvoy Theater, of this city, has bought a Hudson touring car, and intends to leave for Baltimore, Md., on the 15th of August, to look after his theaters in that city. Mr. Spurrier will leave on his touring car for San Francisco, and from there Esst.

Oren F. Woody, road representative of the Seattle branch of the General Film Co., will leave shortly for a trip, calling on the exhibitors throughout the Northwest.

It is rumored that Aiton Fredick, formerly manager of the Seattle office of the General Film Co., has purchased both photoplay theaters at Coigate, Wash.

Messrs. Alton Fredick, formerly manager of the Seattle office of the General Film Co., accompanied by F. T. Bailey, of the Butte, Montana, office of the General Film Co., came to Seattle for a visit yesterday. It is rumored that Mr. Fredick will enter the amusement field in Spoksne, Wash., opening a picture and vaudeville theater, also that he has bought both houses at Colgate, Wash.

R. K. Dunham, sheriff of Skagit connty, Wash., opened to the public, Saturday, July 29, 1911, one of the clsssiest little photoplay theaters in the State. A complete outfit, including a Powers No. 6 Cameragraph, was sold by the General Fiim Co.

The Circuit Theater, of this city, secured Kslem's Historical Drama, "The Mexican Joan of Arc," and ranks as one of the best productions Kalem hss turned out. Mansger Levy states they play to very good houses during the four-day stay.

W. G. Tate, formerly mansger of the Spurrier Amusement Co., of this city, will become salesman for the Western Film Co., of this city. Mr. Tate is formerly from Kentucky, and is considered a very good man for the position.

Manager Roy Whitehouse annonnces that the Acme Theater will, in the future, be the home of the Imp and Bison films.

The Bijou Theater, on First Avenue, owned by H. O. Allen, the oldest motion picture exhibitor in Seattle, has decided to change the name of his theater to the Savoy. Manager Allen secured the rights for Seattle for the Langford-McVey fight, and played to capacity bnsiness, raising his admission fee to 10 cents for thst occasion. The pictures were secured from the Independent Western Film Exchange, of Portland, Oregon.

The Jewell Theater, formerly owned by F. W. Jewell, of this city, will hereafter be known as the Isis Theater. The policy of the house will remain the same, service being secured from the Western Film Co., of this city.

H. E. Cawthorn, delegste to the International Convention of the I. A. T. S. E., returned from Nisgara Falls after a most delightful trip, having won everything he went hack for. Much credit is due Mr. Cawthorn for the part he took in securing jurisdiction over vaudeville houses for the operators of Local 154, and all other locals of the I. A. T. S. E.

A romance in theatrical circles, developed into a marriage, on Monday, July 31, when Mr. James Q. Clemmer took as his bride Miss Marie Cleveland. Mr. Clemmer is proprietor of the Kenneth Hotel and the Dream Theater, Seattle's prettiest photoplay house, and it wss in his capacity as theatrical manager, that Mr. Clemmer met his fate in Miss Cleveland, a pleasing singer who came to fill a two weeks' engagement in his theater. The two weeks ran into twelve months, and Cupid was busy all the time. After a two weeks' wedding tour, Mr. and Mrs. Clemmer will be at home to their friends at their new home on Hartford Avenne.

LOUISVILLE.

The future of two moving picture playhouses received a setback here last week when permits to build houses in residence districts were revoked on complaint of people of the neighborhood. No less a personage than Mayor W. O. Head was responsible for the revocation of one of the licenses, while Father J. T. O'Connor, pastor of the Church of the Holy Name, caused the downfall of the other. Mayor Head's excuse was that such a place was a nuisance. Mrs. Lula B. Greeley was the person who wished to erect a playhouse at Fourth and O Streets, and who was foiled by Father O'Connor. Mayor Head opposed the plan of Sol Ullmann, who wished to build at Second and Burnett Streets. Just what effect this will have remains to be seen. It is possible that the courts may be resorted to before the question is settled. At any rate, the way is paved to some interesting possibilities.

In spite of this affair, permits for moving picture shows continue to be applied for and granted in various parts of the city. The Broadway Amusement Company was granted a permit Saturday for a theater to cost $35,000 and to be built at Twenty-third and Market Streets. The building will be fireproof throughout, only concrete and steel being used in its construction. It will cover ground 75 by 150 feet and will seat 2,000 people. Fred Dolle is president of the Broadway Amusement Company, which also operates other playhouses here.

Robert Lucas is another who will enter the moving picture show field, having secured a permit to erect a building at 2001 Frankfort Avenue. Mr. Lucas will spend $6,000 on the structure and will make it first class in every respect.

Barney McDevitt, formerly a bookmaker, and Frank McGrath, prominent in Democratic politics, have completed a moving picture house at Seventh and Oak Streets in the heart of "Limerick," which will be thrown open to the public either this week or next. A feature, the operation of which will be watched with a good deal of interest by proprietors of local houses, will be a gallery for the use of colored persons. While there are now one or two houses exclusively for negroes in the city, this is the first that will cater to both black and white. Should it prove a success, it will doubtless be adopted extensively in cities where race antipathy exists as it does here.

The Princess Amusement Company, which has under its control the Orpheum, the Columbia, Casino, and Hopkins, continues the pace it set early in the season. All four houses are as popular as ever, and the crowds continue to patronize them as always. All these theaters are undergoing a general overhauling in anticipation of cold weather, but not to such an extent as to curtail seating capacity. Heaters are being tested, and the places are undergoing a general polishing so that all will be ready for the first touch of Jack Frost.

Charles Shaw, owner of the Avenue Theater, which has been running moving pictures since the close of the regular season in May, has installed an orchestrion in the lobby of his showhouse, and is reaping the harvest of the investment, the crowds apparently being remarkably appreciative. Mr. Shaw has also initiated a practice which is unique. He has raised the Sunday price of his show to ten cents, and declares that it is a success, the added nickel seeming to have no deterrent effect on the merry-makers.

The Glenn-Bauer Motor Company, of this city, has aroused interest in E-M-F and Flanders cars by a novel method of exploitation of the moving picture. With 6,000 feet of films, the company will demonstrate the method of constructing the two types of automobiles in its showrooms Tuesday and Wednesday evenings. Other firms have a sharp eye on the plan and should it prove the success it promises, it will be only a matter of time till the moving picture makes its advent into various commercial lines.

Moving pictures are enjoying the same prosperity out in the State as in the metropolis. While many new houses are going up, the pinnacle of the architect's genius seems to have been reached in the Colonial, Lexington's new picture playhouse, which has just been completed at a cost of $15,000. The picture service will be the most expensive given any theater in the country and will include masterpieces by every well known manufacturer. A Powers No. 6 machine has been installed. The seating arrangement of the Colonial is one which has created considerable favorable comment. The curtain is placed six feet above the first row of seats, allowing every person in the house a good view of the screen. Two wide aisles run the entire length of the house, allowing patrons to find seats or leave the theater without jostling their neighbors, or impeding the general view of the pictures. Three exits, five feet wide each, and two others, three feet wide, have been provided, and, as these doors lead to both Main and Water Streets, both ventilation and safety are assured. Nineteen ventilators, however, will be employed in keeping the building cool, and the air will be constantly changed every minute. The combined energy of the ventilators will empty and renew the building of air every few moments. The chairs with which patrons are provided are the most elaborate obtainable and besides being the strongest are the most comfortable on the market. Battleship linoleum will cover the entire floor space and to obtain the finest texture, a popular Scottish make has been introduced.

Another feature that looms out favorably is that the operating room is entirely separate from the main auditorium, and a movable box office, designed after Hammerstein's in New York, has been installed. Marble and cathedral glass are used in the construction of the ticket office. Two doormen in uniform will stand at the entrance while two cashiers will sell tickets; five ushers will attend to the wants of the patrons and two operators, two singers, and two piano players will furnish the amusement. The tickets will be dropped into modern ticket choppers as the patrons pass through the main entrance. The lobby is done in tile and stucco work, with dozens of handsome mirrors adorning the walls, while the ceiling is of the finest decorative steel. All electric wiring has been done by experts, according to the dictates of the National Board of Fire Underwriters. Fire extinguishers are placed at convenient distances. In the event that the electric lights should at any time be suddenly cut off, the house is fitted with emergency gas burners. Four hundred persons can be seated at a time without crowding, and no one will be allowed to stand in the aisles during a picture play. The Colonial is owned by the Colonial Amusement Company, of which John B. Elliott is president and general manager.

INDIANAPOLIS.

John M. Rhodes, treasurer of the Moving Picture Managers' Association, has submitted to arrest in order to test the recently passed child labor law. Under this law the police have not permitted any one under sixteen to be employed in moving picture theaters and have also refused to allow children under sixteen to participate in amateur vaudeville acts in such places. Rhodes, after arranging with the police to be arrested, allowed a small boy to participate in an amateur vaudeville stunt for a prize. The moving picture theater men charge unfairness on the part of the police, saying that children are permitted to compete for cash prizes in medicine shows, but not in moving picture theaters.

Louis Burckhardt is building a steel and concrete balcony in his Oriental Theater, in South Meridian Street. The balcony will seat 460 people. The Oriental is the most elaborate five-cent moving picture theater in the city. It is of fireproof construction, the walls being of brick, the floor of concrete and the ceiling of metal. There is a good-sized stage and the first floor seats 750 people. Metal theater chairs are used. The theater cost about $15,000 and was opened several months ago. Pictures and light vaudeville are shown.

A moving picture theater will be established at Swayzee by the Swayzee Opera House Company, which has been organized and incorporated with an authorized capitalization of $900. Those interested in the project are D. L. Spears, W. G. Sims and W. H. Ammon.

The Vista Theater will open about Aug. 20 at Washington and Oriental Streets. The theater is in a new two-story building, part of which is to be used by a business concern and the upper floor for apartments. The new theater is practically fireproof, with concrete floors and metal ceilings. Moving pictures will be shown exclusively.

Matt Lindsley, manager of the Lyric, a moving picture theater at Columbus, has leased a theater at Seymour and has installed M. H. Luther as manager.

CLARENCE L. CUMMINS.

LOS ANGELES.

Arthur S. Hyman, president of the Southern California Moving Picture Association and owner of a string of theaters throughout Southern California, has compiled statistics, which show that over 60,000 people patronize the picture houses each week day and about 100,000 on Sundays. The owners of these houses realize a revenue of about $52,000 per week. Mr. Hyman declares that there are 96 moving picture houses in the city, of which 84 are members of the Southern California Moving Picture Association. The majority of theaters have already complied with the new city ordinance that will go into effect within a few weeks, requiring a sufficient number of lights in the room to enable a person to distinguish the face of another ten feet away. Some of the houses are so illuminated that it is not difficult to recognize one at a distance of about 40 or 50 feet away.

The "Art," Fifth and Broadway, was recently bought by Harry W. Hahn. The exterior and interior were remodeled and a number of extra lights were installed. Two Powers No. 6 machines took the place of the old machine previously used. The place is running three second run Licensed reels.

The Banner, Main near Fifth Street, has been renovated and is showing three Licensed reels and one illustrated song. There is a two-piece orchestra. The place is owned by J. C. Hening. This house was previously known as the Family theater. The former owners refused to pay the rent asked of them and moved to San Bernardino. A beautiful electric sign representing a United States banner now adorns the front of the house.

NEW ENGLAND NOTES.

The William Fox Amusement Company, the well known film exploiting "pop" vaudeville and motion pictures, together with the estate of the late G. D. Nelson, has lost the case against the Nelson Theater Company, of Springfield, Mass. Special Master N. P. Avery handed down his decision in the Superior Court, and finds that the Nelson Theater Company is owed $4,771.65 by the two above-mentioned parties. This case is an old affair, having hung fire nearly three years. In 1909, G. D. Nelson and an attorney for the Fox Amusement Company seized the Nelson Theater, Springfield, Mass., and held the house for over one month, presenting "pop" vaudeville and pictures. Then the court intervened, and held it unlawful, as the Fox Company had no right to the Nelson Theater. Immediately after this decision, Mr. Poli, the well known theatrical man, demanded that he be paid for the illegal use of his premises. Mr. Poli had leased the Nelson Theater from the Shuberts in 1908, and it was agreed that no vaudeville should be presented in the Nelson Theater for a period of ten years.

Manager C. E. Cook, picture promoter, of Fall River, Mass., has lost the services of Colonel W. F. Mason, as the latter has resigned his position with Mr. Cook.

Reliable sources are stating that Mr. B. F. Keith will very shortly acquire the Lynn Theater, Lynn, Mass., and that he will operate the same as a "pop" vaudeville and picture house. The Lynn Theater is of huge seating capacity; but its location cannot be called of the best. It needs a manager of Mr. Keith's ability to make a winner of the Lynn Theater. "Pop" vaudeville and pictures have been tried by several managers up to this date, but a deficit was the regular result of the experiment. It is also rumored that Mr. Harry Katze's Auditorium Theater, of Lynn, will no longer present vaudeville and pictures, but that a stock company will be introduced.

Frank V. Gilson, connected with the Bijou Theater, Fitchburg, Mass., playing "pop" vaudeville and pictures, is on his vacation, spending that time at the annual maneuvers of the Massachusetts State Militia. Manager Harold F. Jackson, of the Bijou, is certainly enjoying excellent business this summer.

July 27 saw the ending of the litigation between B. F. Keith and F. F. Proctor. On that date the litigation, which was before the Supreme Court of Maine, was brought to a settlement by mutual agreement of both sides and the sanction of the Supreme Court. The corporation, formed under Maine laws, and known as the Keith & Proctor Amusement Company, is to be dissolved. Messrs. Keith and Proctor are to be handed back again the theaters owned individually by them before the company was formed, and which were part of company's assets.

Manager Frank Morgan, of the Music Hall, Milford, Mass., is doing "some business" with motion pictures and illustrated songs as the attractions.

The Merrimack Theater, Lowell, Mass., is to have a new manager, in the person of Emil H. Gerstle, when it reopens on Aug. 15 for the summer season. Manager Gerstle has very successfully headed the Congress Square Theater, Portland, Me., for several years. He has had much experience, and should make good with the Merrimack Square, as the house is both large and well equipped in every way. "Pop" vaudeville and pictures are to be given.

The Casino Theater, Providence, R. I., reopened Aug. 7, with its regular attractions of "pop" vaudeville and pictures.

HENRY.

ST. LOUIS.

The Garrick Theater, one of the higher class downtown theaters, showed the Kinemacolor Coronation pictures last week and packed the house daily.

The Empress Theater, which is being built at Grand and Olive Streets, by Messrs. Heih and Kiley, at a cost of $100,000, or more, will be one of the handsomest structures of its kind in the West, according to present plans. This theater will be fireproof throughout and equipped with exits and firefighting apparatus, as required by law. The seating capacity of the Empress will be 1,800, of which 1,100 will be seated on the first floor and 700 in the balcony. Mr. Heih announces that the Empress will be opened on or about October 1st, with highclass vaudeville and motion pictures. The vaudeville will be furnished by the Western Vaudeville Association.

The Missouri Airdome is showing a feature film this week of the Elks' convention at Atlantic City. Many notable St. Louis Elks appear in this picture. It has been a heavy drawing card, owing to that feature.

The management of the St. Charles Theater announce that they have booked The Pathe Weekly Current Events of the World. The demand for the Pathe Weekly is enormous in St. Louis.

The Hippodrome, at 13 N. Broadway, known as the king of all 5c houses, has booked several feature films for the coming week.

Eugene L. Hammerstein, manager of the St. Charles Theater, was forced, by ill health, to resign his position. Mr. Hammerstein's main ambition has always been to please the patrons, among whom he was well known when forced to resign. Mr. Wm. Fink will succeed Mr. Hammerstein as manager of the St. Charles.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

Few films have caused greater demonstration in a community where all the participants on the screen were known, than that of "The Mascot of Troop C," the first of a series of the Ft. Meyer military pictures, taken by the Solax Company. Not only did Washingtonians enjoy seeing their friends from the fort on the screen, but the soldiers formed the greater part of the audience during the entire day, and laughed as heartily as if it were a real comedy in a real big theater. The fact that most of the troop had been pressed into theatrical service without a moment's notice, by Director Melville, made something of a frolic amid the monotonous routine of army life. The mascot himself, known among the boys as Buster, was in the audience and received as much admiration as some of the real stage children. "Weren't you afraid to ride that horse so fast?" I asked, as in the picture he raced to the Post. "Oh, no," he replied with wide open eyes, "You see I had a saddle under me, and that pony knows me. But he isn't so easy to ride so fast bareback."

When asked if he liked to play in the picture, Buster replied, enthusiastically, "Yes, indeed. They wanted to take me to New York, but of course I couldn't leave home. It looks so funny to see myself there," and he chuckled with boyish delight. "I didn't think it would look so nice." The mascot is a tot of ten years, with yellow hair and big eyes, and an all-around boy. Such was the demonstration at the Empress, when Manager Notes featured "The Mascot of Troop C." All the Ft. Meyer photoplays will appear at this theater and Washington is looking forward to these first performances with interest.

Tom Moore's live-wire advertisement of a full page in one of our big Sunday papers, is creating lots of talk. People are wondering how motion picture business can pay for such an outlay of money, when theaters asking $2.00 per seat can afford scarcely one-sixteenth as much. "Why, I never entered such a money-making investment before in all my life!" exclaimed Mr. Moore, when the question was put to him, "Does it pay?" he ejaculated. "Well, I should say it does. It has. I'm putting hundreds of dollars in this weekly advertisement, but I'm getting a hundred per cent. in box-office returns. I've been an exchange man before, but I'll show you what it is to be an exhibitor." The "wrinkles" or "daffydills" of the Moore advertisement are being quoted all over town. One of these reads: "If the Washington Monument weighs 1,000,000 tons, what does the Speedway?" This is by Tom Moore's chauffeur, who claims he can run 70 miles an hour and not get caught on this fashionable drive.

Another classic drama had a successful run of four days at the Virginia in "Napoleon and Josephine." Manager Noonan believes in the saying, "When you have a good thing, hold on to it," and this is what he does to notable films. Julius Caesar is making a four days' stay this week, as did the Merchant of Venice, Macbeth and other of the Shakespearean dramas.

Manager Brylawski is exhibiting some artistic hand posters before his theaters. More attractive lobby displays can scarcely be found than those of the Colonial, the Pickwick, the Palace and the Cosmos. Vaudeville is the chief feature at the last. It is attention to this sort of detail that popularizes the motion picture theaters. The "Two-gun Man" made quite a hit at the Colonial on its first day of release.

A new departure in motion picture enterprises is being advanced by Manager Airey, in circus form. With a big tent, he has sent out a company of films, the chief actors being "The Fall of Troy," and "The Pirates of 1920." Two or three other reels will complete the cast, offering a show for 25 cents. The route will extend through the Southern States. Something that has not been attempted before, as far as I know, in motion pictures, will be featured at this show in the form of fireworks in such parts of the films as will permit. Fire dangers have been precluded by Manager Airey himself, who is something of a genius in "home inventions," many of which he has in operation at his Alhambra Theater, but he won't tell us about them. When asked how he secures this or that "effect," he will reply slowly, "Well, just a little scheme of my own. How do you like it?"

HARRISBURG, PA.

I. Silverman, manager of the Photoplay, is spending a week in Altoona Pa. During his absence his brother Jacob will be in charge of the theater.

Herman Silverman, of the Liberty Film Renting Exchange, is a business visitor in our city.

Chas. M. Fells is fast gaining a reputation for constructing what he calls the Fellsite Screen for the projection of pictures in lighted theaters. Mr. Fells installed his new invention in the Summit and Photoplay theaters in this city recently; he has also made a number of screens for other cities and is now making one for the writer hereof to be used in his charity entertainments through the State. Fellsite screens can be rolled up, thus protecting them from dust and dirt.

H. W. Smith, of Lebanon, Pa., has accepted a situation as operator at the Photoplay.

Manager William Rexroth, of the Arena, reports excellent business at that new theater, running Independent service which is secured from the Photoplay Film Exchange of this city.

Harrisburg is pretty well supplied with theaters at this writing. The following is the list in order of opening: Bijou Theater, M. Magaro, manager; Star Theater, Adams & Fry, owners and managers; Lyric Theater, Burket & George Bros., owners; Hippodrome Rumpfort & Rexroth, owners and managers—this is the only 10-cent house in the city—Theatorium, owned and managed by Ben Buckwalter; Photoplay, owned and managed by Silverman Brothers, of Altoona, Pa.; The Royal and Imperial, owned and managed by I. Marcus; The Grand, owned by Mike Baturim; The Summit, owned by Zarker & Miller; The Lenney, owned by Lenney & Co.; The Arena, owned by Rumpfort & Rexroth; The Victoria, owned and managed by George Bros.

If there is one man among men to be congratulated as being a live wire in the Independent cause it is A. F. Branka, manager of the Photoplay Film Exchange, of this city. A few years back Mr. Branke conducted an association exchange until the trust forced him out of business, or rather into the Independent ranks, where he has done good work. My reasons for saying good work is due to the fact that to-day all of the fifteen houses showing motion pictures, including Paxtang Park, are using Independent films except the Theatorium and Lenney's. Lenney's will no doubt go Independent the coming week. This record speaks well for Mr. Branka's hustling ability as a film renter. Mr. Branka is assisted by his wife and brother, who are likewise hustlers for the Independent cause.

K. M. Masenheimer, manager of the Union Film Exchange, continues to enjoy a nice business in the renting end of the motion picture field. Mr. Masenheimer is local sales agent for the Motiograph machine and has been selling a number of the same during the past few weeks.

Peter Settine, manager of the new Orpheum Theater of Steelton, expects to open his new house Aug. 19.

Manager Sellers of the Standard, Steelton, is doing good business. Mr. Sellers believes in advertising and nightly he has something interesting to say about his show, using a well written reader in the daily papers. M. H. H.

CLEVELAND.

Of all the funny stories told at the convention this one related by Mr. Neff, the first president of the newly formed National Association, undoubtedly takes the cake: A middle-aged couple from the country walked into his theater in Cincinnati late one afternoon and were given seats in one of the rear rows. Mr. Neff frequently asks his patrons for their opinion of his show as they leave the theater, and as the ruralites came out some time later, he tapped the husband on the shoulder and inquired how they had enjoyed the show. The man from the mountains of Kentucky straightened up, shifted his "chaw of terbaccer," and gazed at Mr. Neff a full minute before he replied: "It wuz a gol derned good show, but they sot us down so fer back that we cudden't hear what them acter folks wuz a-sayin'."

"Mephisto at the Piano" made a great hit at the Alhambra with his "supernatural playing" during convention week. Most of the out-of-town exhibitors visited the Alhambra and came away with a better appreciation of the phenomenal popularity of the photoplay, and marveled at its drawing power, when properly presented.

Keith's Prospect Theater has closed for the summer. Business was very good until the policy of giving motion pictures was interrupted by the two weeks' visit of Vaughan Glaser's Stock Company some time ago. The lovers of Prospect pictures forgot to come back when the policy was resumed, and it was finally closed.

Wm. E. Sage in the Sunday Leader, took a deserved crack at Essanay's "Outlaw Samaritan" in a recent two-column article on the effects of the motion picture on regular theaters. The glorification of the criminal at the expense of law and justice was the feature of the picture, which called forth his severe criticism. Manufacturers and directors would do well to make a note of that phrase and religiously guard against commiting the blunder in future releases.

The Doan Thenter, at St. Clair and E. 105th Streets, it is announced, will open on Saturday, Aug. 19.

Kinemacolor pictures of the Coronation of King George, and other events of the celebration, are booked at the Keith's Hippodrome for the week of Aug. 14. Manager Daniels went to New York to make final preparations, and to transact other business connected with the coming season's attractions.

Moran-Wolgast fight pictures were shown at the Star Thenter, a burlesque house now closed, during the week of July 31. Officials of the Civic Reform Leagle made efforts to have the exhibition stopped on the same grouuds which prevented the showing in Cleveland of pictures of the Jeffries-Johnson fight, but were unsuccessful.

The local daily newspapers devoted many columns to news, and supposed news, of the Exhibit' ors' Convention. Time was when it required a conflagration which could be charged to the films to attract the editors' attention to the motion picture. And still, some people ask if the photoplay will last.

B. G. DRUMMOND.

IN THE MISSISSIPPI VALLEY.

George Main, keeper of the Pike County (Illinois) Poor Farm, did a worthy thing recently, when he took a number of the inmates to a moving picture show. The manager was no less considerate in extending an invitation to the unfortunates to be his guests at the performance. They enjoyed it from start to finish. A moving picture machine in every Illinois almshouse would be no burden on the taxpayers, and certainly would brighten up a cheerless existence.

Manager Guiteau, of the Majestic Theater, Freeport, Ill., set people talking about his place by announcing that a Freeporter soon would be seen in moving pictures. Patronage increased as many were curious to see what "a home boy" could do.

In conserving the good name of the photoplay we would, if we were the Springfield, Illinois, proprietors, say something to the paper that runs its suggestive optician's advertising "For Failing Eyesight," in juxtaposition to the picture house programs. Nor do we hold up as a model the Southern Illinois manager whose blackface lines in the daily paper first startled us: "White Slave Traffic Show."

The Moving Picture World representative was unable to see the Jesse James pictures which, despite the furore which they created in other Illinois towns, went unheeded by the police of Springfield, Ill. They were presented for two days at the Royal Theater, the questionable advertising of two masked men riding the streets with banners on their horses being used. They drew large crowds, especially of young men and boys.

W. C. Voss, proprietor of the Wigwam Airdome, of Geneseo, Ill., has a stanch defender in the editor of The Republic, of that city. Recently, a lecturer on Social Purity, and the Evils of the White Slave Traffic, appeared in Geneseo. The Republic gave two columns in defense of picture shows in general, and The Wigwam especially, because of the street-speaker, who, either through ignorance, or because he was possessed of an unworthy prejudice, took occasion to take a fling or two at picture shows, and to charge it up to all picture shows that they are harmful to the community, and that to attend these shows was detrimental to the character of the young people. Of the Wigwam, the Republic says: "It has become an important part of the community life. Men, women, boys and girls, in all walks of life enjoy their occasional visits to these exhibitions, relaxation, amusement and instruction. * * * Mr. Voss has been careful, and at no time has he given the most fastidious critic opportunity to find fault with the pictures shown." An article by Rev. Herbert A. Jump, of New Britain, Conn., upon educational pictures, is also reproduced.

Any sort of punishment that the most ingenious director of rough-and-tumble French comedy can devise will be welcomed by Illinois photoplay house managers, for the despicable youths who threw sneezing powders and vile-smelling perfumes into their theaters. The last place visited was Marseilles, where crowds at the Ruby Palace and Empire picture shows were afflicted with a malodorous powder and several forced to leave. The police are looking for the contemptible jokers. In other cities a lookout is maintained for the cayenne-pepper and "cachoo" fiend.

Films depicting the white slave traffic were barred in Rockford, Ill., as the result of complaint lodged against advertising signs displayed at the Princess Moving Picture Theater. The mayor and chief of the police witnessed a special run of the pictures, which were regarded as too suggestive. The engagement was canceled. The two-column six-inch ad of the Princess went through the Register-Gazette blank, save for the name of the theater, while editorially the paper called the attention of the authorities to the film and condemned it on general principles.

The Illinois Amusement Company, under the management of R. P. Hannahan, has opened at Fisher, Ill., where the Opera House has been leased for one year. Moving pictures, a vaudeville act and illustrated songs are given. Mr. Hannahan has also arranged for moving picture houses at Gilford and Potomac.

Films of the head camp of Modern Woodmen of America, taken at Buffalo, N. Y., in June, promise to have a good patronage in Illinois, the home and stronghold of the order.

Edward T. Dolly, of Rock Island, Ill., has leased the new Tri-City Theater in that city for a term of five years.

Although the Palace Opera House, at Plymouth, Ill., has again been traded, Frank Noel is still manager.

Renn Chapman, of Chenoa, Ill., has purchased the Pastime Theater, a photoplay house in that city, of Starkey & Payne.

Edward Leisy, of Peoria, has purchased the interest of William D. Dickson in the Majestic Theater, at Peoria, for $51,500. It is rumored that this house, together with the Majestic Theater, Springfield, Ill., which have been controlled by the National Amusement Company, will be given over to vaudeville.

The Halsh Auditorium, DeKalb, Ill., was one of the first to show the films of the great harvesting tournament recently held in the Whitmore field, between Sycamore and DeKalb. The local color of the show was an innovation for DeKalb people. F. H. M.

A Powerful Play is a Powers Play—More Power to the Powerful Powers Picture Plays

REMEMBER—Tues. Aug. 15—The Children's Reel
A living version of the ancient Nursery Rhyme

Babes in the Woods

A new way of telling the old, old story that is ever young and of which children never seem to tire. A treat for the Kiddies, and a reward for good behavior that they will strive to earn. Produced under the direction of Mr. Fred Walton, the well known English Pantomimist of many years experience in London Xmas Pantomimes and on the American Vaudeville Stage. It is one of those pictures that the Exhibitor can book again and again—while for the Exchange it is an investment that will pay dividends for years to come.

On Sat. Aug. 19—Our Regular Indian Story

The Squaw's Devotion

The story of a white man's bravery and a half-breed's cowardice—proving once again that faint heart never won fair lady nor fair squaw, for both are women. A Nature Picture that will please all lovers of the free open life of the primeval forest, with just enough adventure to make it thrilling. : : : :

CHANGE OF RELEASE—TUES. AUG. 22
Instead of "Measuring a Wife" and "The Falls of Bohemia" we will release an Indian Story

Black Cloud's Debt

The laws of the red man were simple but inflexible. The claims of love, kinship and friendship were coldly set aside by the stern, rude, legendary law of the forest. A picture that depicts the stoical side of the Indian's code of honor. According to unwritten laws, an Indian was either a brave or a coward. There was no middle ground. No compromise.

Regular Saturday Indian Release Aug. 26

The Indian's Love

The right of might played a large part in an Indian's love. Maidens were often bartered, but barter isn't love. To have and to hold were two different things in the forest life, especially if lovers were of warring tribes.

JUDGE SIMPKINS' SUMMER COURT (Aug. 15).—In the little town of Waterloo, the suburb of a large city, so frequent have become the arrests of auto speeders that a branch court is instituted at the outskirts of the village, where most of the arrests have taken place. Judge Simpkins and the attaches of the branch court are lounging under the trees, waiting for speeders, but have waited all day in vain, and when they are invited over to a neighboring farmhouse to help Sid Jenklns move a corn crib, they are delighted at the chance to make the few extra dollars. They are gone but a short time when a crowd of hoboes come on the scene and take possession of the court. They arrest several speeders and finally a young fellow with a small car, which appears to he a baby compared with the others. In this they set out for a joy ride. This, however, proves their undoing, for Judge Simpkins and the others have heard of them, through one of their victims, and starts In pursuit. The tramps are finally arrested and receive their just deserts.

THE TRAMP ARTIST (Aug. 15).—A hobo, with some talent at art, does all sorts of things to signboards. But his ingenuity helps him little when he falls into the arms of the law.

FOR HE'S A JOLLY GOOD FELLOW (Aug. 18).—Paul Wharton, a young business man, arises from his breakfast table, and kissing his wife and baby good-bh, starts to leave the house, when Mrs. Wharton stops him and curiously asks him if he knows the day of the month. Doubtfully, he looks at the morning papers in his hand and replies that it is August 18. With indifference he turns to the door and goes out after she begs him to come home early in the evening. It is her birthday, hut he has forgotten! That evening, in his office, he closes his desk and is about to leave when four or five of his friends enter and heg him to join them In a little party at a nearby garden that night. He consents, then remembers his promise to his wife and calls her on the 'phone, pleading important business which must detain him at the office. That night the baby becomes Ill and Mrs. Wharton hegs the doctor to call in the morning. As she turns from the 'phone, Wharton, a little worse for liquor, enters. The wife hegs to know why he did not come home, but his answer is evasive and he goes silently off to his bed-chamber. In the morning the doctor calls, hut too late to save the child's life. Just as the little one expires, Wharton enters, and realizing what has happened he falls beside the baby's cot and hegs forgiveness for his neglect of his family.

A PAL'S OATH (Aug. 19).—Two pals, Jack Manley and John French, are employed on a large ranch in Wyoming. French falls sick with fever and Jack goes for a doctor. This latter, however, refuses to accompany Jack without his payment in advance and Jack, in despair, Is forced to depart without the doctor. Back at the hunk house he conceives the plan to hold up a pony express rider and does so, securing enough money to pay for the doctor's services. A few months later both hoys, though the fact Is unknown to each other, fall in love with Marie Wentworth, the daughter of the neighboring ranch owner. One day they both meet at the house of the girl and after both propose Jack Is accepted. French is aware that Jack held up the pony express and resolves to get rid of his friend by turning him over to the law. Jack is arrested and sent to prison, after he has sworn an oath to get even with his traitorous friend after he is released. The time comes. A few years later Jack slips up to the house and peers in the window. He pulls his revolver and Is about ready to fire, when French suddenly lifts his baby in his arms and unconsciously covers himself with his child. After another unsuccessful attempt to kill French, Jack finally throws down his weapon and slips away, leaving French and his happy little family unconscious of the death hovering near them.

GOSSIPING YAPVILLE (Aug. 22).—When old Jim Lovery affectionately pats his wife on the cheek a gossiping neighbor woman mistakes the love pat for a slap and hurries off to tell another woman. In turn the story is repeated to a third, and yet to another, the story growing until by the time It has reached the fifth eager ear the report now is that Jim Lovery tried to cut his wife's throat. They then notify the town constable, who goes to arrest Old Jim, hut on entering the house finds the old couple together as happy as two young lovers. Explanations are then forthcoming and it is finally decided to punish the first carrier of the news. She is therefore taken and thrown in the creek, after which sousing she promises to quit tattling for all and good.

SUMMER BABIES (Aug. 22).—In the congested section of Chicago more than fifty nurses are engaged In visiting from house to house, and employed at haby tents, in caring for the sick babies of the poor. The accompanying illustration shows the Interior of a baby tent on the roof of Mary Crane Day Nursery, where the babies are given medical attention and mothers are instructed how to care for them during the hot weather. There are free milk and ice stations, where poor mothers are supplied with milk and ice for the haby and are supplied with small, inexpensive ice-boxes free. In this work the Chicago Department of Health, under whose supervision this work is carried on, has saved several hundreds of babies' lives every summer.

FATE'S FUNNY FROLIC (Aug. 25).—A young society matron, Charlotte Wayne, plans a house party and among her invitations are those to Richard Malcolm, a bachelor, and Alice Trevor, a young, unmarried lady, whom it would be unsafe to call an old maid. Mrs. Wayne, who is an inveterate matchmaker, has a scheme in mind—that of matching these two perfectly good friends of hers. But Dick and Alice have never met and by coincidence meet at the railway station under circumstances which do not reflect well on Dick's good character, although he has been in no part to blame. The second misfortune occurs on the train and increases the young lady's anger with Dick, whom she believes is purposely annoying her. Arriving at the little station of Hazlehurst, Dick is surprised to find that the young lady is also leaving the train. On the station platform another accident occurs, which agaiu puts Dick in a bad light, and uuder other circumstances might have proved serious. Accidentally Dick, in passing the young lady, who is about to enter a motor car, he hooks her handbag in his golf club, whereat she promptly has him arrested. He, however, shows his credentials to the village constable, who proves to he a friend of Wayne's, and Dick is released. On the road to Wayue's country home Alice's car breaks down and it is in this disagreeable circumstance she is found by Dick who, despi'e his previous persecution, offers assistance, but Alice refuses. At the home of the Waynes two hours later the delightful young people meet. Imagine their surprise. Alice, at first indignant, and inconsolable, refuses to speak to Dick, hut is finally persuaded to make up. As a sequel to the adventure, and to Charlotte Wayne's match-making, Dick and Alice become engaged and six months later mail an invitation to their marriage to Mr. and Mrs. Wayne.

"SPIKE" SHANNON'S LAST FIGHT (Aug. 26).—"Spike" Shannon, a pugilist hy occupation, signs to fight a 10-round bout, with another young knight of the ring. A contract is drawn and "Spike" and his backers leave the office of the promoter. On the street they encounter a young couple, evidently at outs, but which proves later, upon the girl's explanation, to be a flirtation, in which she has no desire to take part. The masher has insolently insulted her. "Spike" takes in the situation at once and with his strong right arm knocks the dude sprawling. "Spike" then offers to assist the young lady with her basket of washing and is graciously permitted. At the girl's home Nora Flannigan introduces the young Irishman to her mother, who says he may he permitted to call. The affair ends in "Spike" throwing up the "sponge" to the little god Cupid and the two are engaged to be married—when the catastrophe occurs. On the day of the match she learns that he is a pugilist and in tears tells him that he must either give up the fight or give her up, which he at first reluctantly refuses to do, hut later visits the promoter at the club's trainiug quarters and tells this official he refuses to go into the ring. Six months later finds the young couple married. Nora is ill and only an expensive operation can save her life. In desperation "Spike" finally goes to the o[illegible] of the promoter and asks an opportunity t[illegible] go into the ring again. The promoter at first [illegible] him, hut "Spike" is given a chance when [illegible] combatants of a hout scheduled to be tought that night is hurt and "Spike" put in his place. The fight scenes in this picture are remarkably realistic, and the bout going four rounds, in which "Spike," after a hard battle, is the victor, thus winning enough money to pay for the operation, which saves Nora's life.

While in the bunk house a few evenings later he picks up a newspaper of recent date and the following advertisemeut catches his eye: "Wanted—A Husband. A young and beautiful woman with a gentle loving disposition would like to correspond with a man who Is weary of living alone. Address, 'A Lonely, but Loving Woman,' Box 341, The Times."

About a week later he receives a reply from the advertiser and through correspondence arranges to meet her at the station with a clergyman. Laughing Jim, one of the boys on the ranch, learning of Ike's plans, prevails upon Molly, the new cook of the neighboring ranch, to impersonate the bride. Wednesday noon Ike proceeds to the railroad station and while the passengers are landing Jim arranges it so that Molly apparently alights from the train and marches up to Ike who at first attempts to rebel, but through the ridicule and jollying of the boys he permits the knot to he tied. In the meantime Laughing Jim has approached Matilda Roselands, Ike's correspondent, and prevails upon her to wed him. Six months later we find Laughing Jim a thoroughly conquered man. While his wife is sitting rocking in a chair reading, Jim is industriously doiug the family washing. Things have gone far different with Ike. Inviting the boys to his homc to dinner, they are made welcome by Ike's smiling bride and after a good dinner decide that Ike has won the prize.

DON RAMON'S DAUGHTER (Aug. 23).—Manetta, daughter of Don Ramon de Savillo, a wealthy Spaniard, Is In love with Carlos, a poor troubadour. Declining to give up her sweetheart, Manetta is driven from home. Three years later after her husband's death, Manetta's baby is adopted by Donna Loretta. After a lapse of sixteen years we find Donna Loretta's son Francisco in love with his adopted sister. Don Ramon, who has spent several years in travel, writes to his old friend, the father of Francisco saying he has returned to sunny California and will call at his house in a few days. Arriving at the home of Don Jose dl Garcia, his old friend, he meets his grandchild, Carlotta, in whom he sees the likeness of his dead daughter. Explanations take place, but Carlotta spurns the old man on acconnt of his treatment of her mother. A few days later Don Ramon saves his granddaughter from a wandering band of Yaqui Indians and evenutally secures forgiveness of the orphan girl.

THE LITTLE CRIPPLE (Aug. 25).—The parents of little Muriel, a cripple, though poverty stricken and in want, look with distrust on the suggestion that their only child he sent to a hospital. An official of the Department of Charities examines the case and also advises hospital treatment. The parents finally reluctantly consent to an examinatiou. On examination the physician finds the case is one which readily yields to treatment, and fills out the necessary blank. The parents learn their application has been accepted and though still fearful decide to take little Muriel to the hospital. Leaving their little daughter in the hospital, the parents depart with heavy hearts. On their first visit the parents are rejoiced at Muriel's wonderful improvement. The little cripple shows them the sights of the institution, including the sports and industries of the crippled children. Happy on account of the prospects of a complete cure of their little girl, Muriel's father now takes on a new view of life and secures employment. In time Muriel is discharged from the hospital as cured and returns with her parents, where happiness now reigns supreme in the humble home.

SELIG.

SAVED FROM THE SNOW (Aug. 21).—Kit and Davy were two great friends, trapping and hunting together in the early days of the fifties, among the fastnesses of the Sierra Nevada mountains. But they both fell in love with the same girl, and Kit being the handsomer, was acceptable in her eyes.

Calling at her hut one evening Kit was received with smiles and poor Davy with coldness, and he discovered that the reason lies in Kit having already occupied the ground. Rendered unjust by jealousy he accused Kit of unfairness, and they fought it out in the snow, poor Davy receiving a sad mauling and left to nurse a broken head as well as a broken heart, while the conqueror walked off with his Mary, who loved him more than ever for his prowess.

Davy vowed to have done forever with women and the settlements, and went trapping among the mountains. Mary and her Kit were married, and all was bright for them, until one winter night he cut his foot terribly while chopping wood. As the flow of blood could not be stopped, Mary ran to the nearest neighbors for help. Confused by night and snow she lost her way, and was finally overcome by fatigue and cold. Davy on his way to the settlement to barter his peltries for supplies, crossed her trail, followed and rescued her and restored her to the arms of her husband. Time had benumbed his pains and he and Kit shook hands in sincere reconciliation.

LIFE ON THE BORDER (Aug. 22).—Life on the Border is a true story of life in the early days of America.

It is the terrible experience of a young pioneer mother left alone for the day in her wilderness home with only a five-year-old child as company.

The mother is accidentally imprisoned in a woodshed near the cabin, by her child. The little one tries in vain to lift the heavy latch, and while the mother is thus imprisoned, a bear, being pursued by a band of prowling Indians, arrives upon the scene.

Frightened nearly to death, the child hides near a pile of logs.

The imprisoned mother, thoroughly frightened, becomes frantic as the pursuing Indians come upon the scene. The Indians explore the grounds and ransack the empty cabin, finding the "fire water" and medicine chest.

In their subsequent hilarity they set fire to the cabin and out-buildings, among them the shed in which the terrified mother is imprisoned.

The drunken Indians, suddenly remembering the bear, depart in search of the animal.

The flames are rapidly accomplishing their deadly work, when the father sights the hand of marauding Indians as they pass through the woods after the bear. His fears are instantly aroused and he makes all haste for his crude home and dear ones. He arrives just in time to save his wife from the burning shed.

THE GRAY WOLVES (Aug. 24).—Frank Manley, a young broker, wins Leona Harland. A rival suitor for Leona's hand is Robert Blackford, also a broker, on the Board of Trade.

Blackford's disappointment in love makes him a bitter enemy of Manley. A business situation gives him an opportunity to ruin Manley, and Blackford, supported by a clique of brokers, forces up the price of May wheat, which Manley must have to meet his contracts. A great scene shows the wheat pit in the Board of Trade, with busy brokers almost crazed with excitement as the prices go up, due to the bids of Blackford and his followers.

Manley is wrecked financially, mentally and physically. By his physician's advice, Manley goes with a friend into the North woods for a rest. Separated from his friend, Manley is pursued by a pack of wolves and seeks refuge in a hunter's cabin. The wolves jump through the window and attack Manley. Without a weapon, Manley fights the fierce animals and drives them away.

His friend finds him exhausted. Manley, inspired by his awful experience, goes back to the city, re-enters the wheat pit—and wins what he has lost.

LUBIN.

THROUGH JEALOUS EYES (Aug. 17).—Arthur Bedford, before starting on his hunting trip, proposed to Flo, a nurse employed by his father who is a physician. While they were talking, Arthur's father came into the room. Arthur was called to another part of the house, and Mrs. Bedford catches her husband talking with the nurse. She at once gets jealous.

While hunting, Arthur is accidentally shot by his companion, Harry, who, rushing to a passing auto for assistance, discovers that it carries Arthur's father. He telephones to his home for his instruments. Mrs. Bedford answers, and not wishing to shock her, he makes excuses. Later he sends his nurse a note, which falls into the hands of Mrs. Bedford. These incidents drive her to desperation, and she tries to attack Flo, who manages to escape and hurries to where the wounded man lies. An operation is performed and then the young man is brought home. Everything is explained, and the film ends with Mrs. Bedford congratulating her son on his engagement.

THE WORKING GIRL'S SUCCESS (Aug. 19).—Nellie, the daughter of poor parents, was given a letter of introduction by the minister of the church to the head of a shirtwaist factory. It fell into the hands of Howard Gordon, the son of the wealthy manufacturer. She was taken on immediately, and her sweet winning ways made a deep impression upon young Gordon, which, in time, led to their marriage. The young man's family refused to recognize him, and he had to sacrifice his position. He secured a position as conductor on a street car. After five years had elapsed, young Gordon's family asked him to come back with his family. He did and there was a happy reunion.

PROCLAIMING ARCHBISHOP PRENDERGAST (Aug. 19).—A topical film of extraordinary interest showing the great procession of the Rt. Rev. Edmund F. Prendergast, D.D., Archbishop of Philadelphia.

A cross bearer between two acolytes leads the procession. Following this come one hundred seminarians and about three hundred priests, wearing black cassocks and white surplices. Among the priests are Jesuits, Augustinians, Redemptorists and others. There are also several Dominican monks, two Franciscans and eight Augustinians, wearing the black cowled habit of the hermits of St. Augustine. A stream of purple appears in the procession with the approach of the monsignors and bishops. After the bishops walks the Apostolic Delegate, Monsignor Falconio. Last of all comes Archbishop Prendergast crowned with the Episcopal mitre, wearing a magnificent cape of cloth of gold. In his right hand he carries a long golden crozier or shepherd's staff.

The picture shows different views along the line of procession. Throughout it is very interesting, showing exceptionally clear pictures of the Apostolic Delegate and the different bishops, prelates and priests.

A REBELLIOUS BLOSSOM (Aug. 21).—Flo, the sixteen year old child of a widow, was sent to boarding school. An old friend of the widow's renewed his courtship, and almost succeeded in winning her. The widow received a letter from the boarding school, stating that unless Flo was more tractable, she would be suspended.

Her mother took Flo into her confidence, and said that unless she behaved herself she would get married again. This did not please Flo at all, as she did not wish her mother to get married again, so she hurried home.

Concurrently with the arival of Flo, John's nephew arrived. John thought that he is the right kind of a man for Flo, and his nephew thought that Flo is the right kind of a girl for him. So, after due deliberation, Flo and her mother consented to the men's proposals, and they were married.

BESS OF THE FOREST (Aug. 24).—While Richard Mortimer, his wife and baby girl, Bess, were touring through the West, the little girl was lost. She was found by a young Mexican, Juan Garcia, who took her home to his wife.

Mr. and Mrs. Mortimer one day told of the loss of their daughter to some guests, including a young surveyor, Harry Lonsdale. Later Harry stumbles over Garcia's cabin and met Bess, now a beautiful girl of 17. They fell in love at first sight.

Garcia's wife would have been very willing to have gotten rid of the girl, for she thought that her husband was too much interested in her. It seems she had good reasons for her fears too.

At any rate she showed Harry a locket which she had taken from the girl, and Harry at once recognized the picture of Mrs. Mortimer. Greatly excited, he rushed to a nearby ranch. He related the circumstances and the cowboys promptly offered to officiate at a greaser "necktie party," or at least to rescue the girl.

Meantime Garcia had become alarmed. He saddled his horse and ordered Bess to go with him. She could not resist safely, but she strapped on one of his revolvers.

The cowboys soon found the trail and with additional information furnished by Garcia's wife they caught up with the pair.

Harry and Garcia had a hand-to-hand fight with knives and finally the Mexican wounded the young surveyor. As he fell Harry fired and hit Garcia.

Later there was a happy reunion of the Mortimer family and Harry was quickly and gladly received as Bess's future husband.

ARCHIBALD, THE HERO (Aug. 26).—Archibald was a vacuous youth whose vacuity reached such a point that his parents decided to ship him West.

Archie arrived in the land of the cowboy and miner arayed in Western clothes and carrying a cute little revolver. Almost at once he was confronted by "Black Bart," a notorious bad man. Terrified and almost dead with fear, Archie in the excitement drew his little toy revolver. Somehow it went off. "Black Bart," who had killed twenty men and whom the sheriffs had tried in vain to arrest, immediately surrendered, and Archie took him to jail. Immediately Archie became a hero and he certainly did make the most of it.

Lillian Noble, the prettiest girl in the county, fell in love with him, declaring he was a real man. But the next day "Black Bart" escaped from the jail, leaving a note informing Archie that he had submitted to being arrested merely because he pitied the poor little man.

Poor Archie [illegible] display his bravery, and fell down so completely he became a laughing stock. Lillie, however, never laughed at him. She continued to think that he was a bold, brave man and there were wedding bells for them.

EDISON.

THE VENOM OF THE POPPY (Aug. 22).—The sister of a customs inspector of a seaport one day discovers by accident the smugglers' cave where they are storing away their ill-gotten goods. They detain her and bring her before their leader, who proves to be none other than her own sweetheart. She is released at his commands and at once hastens to her religious adviser, the old village priest, and with heart sobs and tears, informs him what she has learned.

If she remains silent her brother will probably lose his position and be disgraced, as he has been ordered to find the guilty parties responsible for the opium smuggling in his port and he is expected to bring them to justice at once. If she tells him the truth she will condemn her lover and practically sentence him to a long term in prison.

The chief inspector of the division of customs visits this little town secretly and after investigation suspects the customs officer for complicity because of his not reporting the offender in the opium smuggling case.

Eventually the brother of the girl learns the truth of the smuggler's guilt from his own lips and for his sister's sake decides to remain silent. He is asked to resign by the chief inspector, which he does, rather than be the one to send the man his sister loves to prison.

The mighty deep of the ocean finds means to make the guilty man a hero in a wonderful dramatic shipwreck rescue and the chief inspector realizes that, though guilty, the prison is no place for a brave heroic man. And so the guilty lover starts life afresh with the love of a sweet little woman to guide him into the best and truest ways of life.

THE PROFESSOR AND THE NEW HAT (Aug. 23).—The little daughter of a professor forgets that she has attained that age when love affairs are the thing and forbids her to associate with the young man she is in love with. He gives her money to buy a new hat. When it reaches the professor, he puts it under the pump and pours water on it, thinking that it is a bunch of flowers the young man sent her. When the young people reach the house, the girl asks for the hat she bought. The professor tells her what he did. She begins crying, and eager to get out of a bad scrape, he comes to terms with the young man.

THE QUESTION MARK (Aug. 23).—Jimmy, a ten-year-old boy, attends Professor Nemo's hypnotic seance one afternoon and steps upon the stage to be hypnotized.

The professor finding it impossible to get the boy under his control, decides to amuse the audience at the boy's expense with the aid of a plate, the bottom of which has been previously blackened. Giving this plate to the boy the professor makes a number of mysterious passes which the boy imitates, with the result that Jimmy smudges a huge question mark on his own face, causing the audience to roar with laughter.

Having learned a new trick Jimmy resolves to try it on some one himself at the very first opportunity, which occurs at home while alone in the kitchen where he blackens a plate over the flame of a candle. The first one to come along is the iceman, who under the impression that he is humoring the boy, unconsciously smudges a big question mark on his own face. Overjoyed at his success, Jimmy goes to the dining-room, where he plays the same trick on his good-natured father, who in turn leaves the black mark on mother's face while caressing her. Then the funny complications begin. The iceman, who slyly kisses the maid, leaves the black mark on her face. Thus marked she enters the dining-room to clear the table where father is seated perusing his newspaper. Mischievous Jimmy now sees the oportunity for some fun; silently he fetches mother and points out the similar marks father and the maid have on their cheeks. Mother's suspicions are aroused and amid anger and tears she leaves the room, entering the kitchen just as the iceman places the ice into the refrigerator. Father hurries into the kitchen and is flabbergasted to find his wife and the iceman in close proximity with the apparent tell-tale marks on their cheeks. Flying into an uncontrollable rage he threatens to lick the iceman within an inch of his life. Then as the maid enters mother berates father and the affair has about reached its climax when it suddenly becomes evident that all are victims of a practical joke. Jimmy is suspected, led in by the ear and made to confess how the trick was done. A sound thrashing seems imminent for him, but his father now sees the funny side of it all and on the promise that he will never do it again, embraces the little rascal.

THEN YOU'LL REMEMBER ME (Aug. 25).—John Grayson, while attending a musicale, is introduced to the singer of a particular song which strikes his fancy, and subsequently marries her.

Business takes Grayson to South America. The ship is wrecked, and Grayson finds himself afloat on a piece of wreckage with two other survivors. One by one they drop into the sea from exhaustion, and he loses consciousness. When he comes to again he finds himself on a steamer bound for Australia. The experience and exposure have affected his brain, rendering it a total blank. His hair is snow white. Two business men take him into their confidence, and teach him the constructing engineering business. He proves to be a good man, and he is sent to New York.

At a reception he attends he hears the song that first attracted his attention. It is played by his wife. In a moment his memory returns, and we see him clasped in his wife's arms.

TWO WHITE ROSES (Aug. 26).—Major Abbott, a well-to-do old bachelor, while endeavoring to sew on a button one day, was chided by his nephew, a prosperous young chap of twenty, for not having a wife to attend to such matters and otherwise adding to the comforts of a home. His words appeal strongly to the major who, being rather tired of single life, resolves mentally to take unto himself a wife, but where, oh where can he find his ideal? An idea strikes him and without apprising the young man of his intention, he inserts a "personal" in the morniug Gazette to some agreeable home-loving woman wisbing to marry. The next day he receives a response from a most charming and estimable spinster whose niece, by the way, happens to be the sweetheart of the major's young nephew. After some confidential correspondence, a meeting is arranged, but never having seen eacb other they agree to wear a white rose as a mark of identification.

The precautions and mysterious manner in which they carry on their correspondence arouses the curiosity and apprehension of the spinster's niece and the major's nepbew to sucb an extent that they follow them to the place of meeting, but not without some amusing complications.

The spinster is the first to arrive at the place of appointment. Being somewhat timid and nervous, she drops her rose unawares, wbich a few moments later is picked up by her uiece, who is in close pursuit.

The major arriving a moment later and seeing the young lady with a white rose, mistakes her for the one wbom he expects to meet and is soundly rebuked for daring to address her. He tries to explain the mark of identity wben be discovers the loss of his rose, which is found by his nephew, who meets tbe spinster, where another case of mistaken identity occurs, after which all four meet. Complications are theu happily straightened out, resulting in a double wedding.

He finally leaves her and sbe soon becomes destitute and despondent; is forced to give up the violin, ber most cherished belonging.

As a last hope she learns the location of ber husband's dwelling, borrows a violin from a street player and beneath the faithless man's window plays the tender music learned in happier years. Its magic brings him in contrition to ber side.

THE ISLAND OF ISHIA, Italy (Aug. 26).—Particularly interesting views of tbis volcanic island, about fifteen miles southwest of the Cape of Miseno, on the Bay of Naples. Inasmuch as tbe island is small, only a matter of nineteen miles in circumference, having an area of about twenty-six square miles, the operator has been able to film nearly every corner. We are shown many tropical street scenes in the town of Casamiccolla, wbicb is best known to the outside world as a south of Europe watering place.

Among the interesting features of this town are the old volcanic ruins, which suggest the great disturbances of 1881-1883. The chief town of the island is Ishia, on the east coast, with a population of about seven thousand people. Here we are also shown many fascinating groups of natives following their ordinary pursuits.

A SUNDAY HUNTING PARTY (Aug. 26).—Dan is very fond of sports and invites several friends to a hunting meet. However, be neglects to send an invitation to one of bis neighbors, who feels very aggrieved, and determines to revenge bis fancied wrongs.

He then plans a rather unique revenge as be tbinks, and calling his servant they proceed to dress his pet fox terrier in the skin of a fox, and set bim loose on the grounds over wbicb the hunters will pass.

The hunting party soon comes into view and a queer looking party it is too. Tbe more fortunate huntsmen are mounted on horses or donkeys, and the otbers follow on foot. They are supplied witb large bunting horns, which they blow vigorously and their costumes are very odd. The hounds are of all sorts, sizes and descriptions, from a small fancy terrier to a big woolly sheep dog, and they are all on leashes.

The supposed "fox" is sitting very contentedly in the field, and is espied by the eager huntsmen and dogs. The hounds go dashing through the woods to the great discomfort of the perspiring huntsmen, who are being dragged behind tbem at the ends of the leashes. Diana unfortunately falls from her horse at this juncture and is dragged for some distance along the dusty road before she is rescued.

The fox passes through a house with tbe men hard on its heels, resulting in considerable damage to the furniture and great consternation on the part of its inmates. From here they are forced to wade and swim through a deep pond, and for their pains only receive a thorough soaking. However, by this time they have become so enthusiastic that they are ready for almost anything tbey may have to undergo to get that "fox."

However, the little fox terrier (the supposed fox) is rather tired of being pursued and returns to his home, followed by the hunting party. When they are all on tbe scene his master removes the skin covering the dog, and laughs at the buntsmen and Dan for their pains.

But this time the rest of the hunting party are angry at poor Dan, and he falls in for his full share of the blame, and they succeed in giving bim quite an unhappy ending of his merry day.

CONDEMNED FOR TREASON (Aug. 23).—Maurice Malfrey, a young painter, is in Italy to pursue his studies. Unhappily his father can no longer provide his expenses and writes him about it. Maurice is in love with a pretty girl, Lucia, and explains matters to her.

Lucia asks her parents to receive Maurice as a friend in their home. Thus the young painter is enabled to pursue his studies. A few months later war breaks out between France and Italy. Maurice's father advises him that he has received the young man's call to service and asks him to do his duty. Maurice joins the army and promptly becomes a lieutenant.

One day an order of Bonaparte is sent to General Mont to send a company to the village of Bossal, where some peasants still resist the French soldiers. Maurice serves in the company sent there and after a sharp fight finds himself in the presence of Lucia and her parents, which have encouraged the peasants in their resistance. The people are arrested and are about to be shot when Maurice intervenes and even liberates the prisoners.

When this action is reported to the headquarters of his army the young lieutenant is arrested and court-martialed. He refuses to give the reason that caused him to act as he did and finally is sentenced to military degradation and five years of penal servitude. The five years pass. Maurice after the expiation returns to Italy in order to again see Lucia, but is heart-broken when he finds she is married.

WOOL INDUSTRY OF HUNGARY (Aug. 26).—In motion pictures this portion of Austria-Hungary has never before been presented. The district is surrounded by mountains of the Carpathian Range, which give it the character of a huge natural fortress.

Every phase of the local wool industry is superbly illustrated and the whole is concluded by portrait presentments of peasant girls most elaborately attired.

The Wool Industry—Flock of Hungarian sheep. Clipping and washing wool, primitive methods. Spinning by hand. Winding of the yarn. Handloom weaving. Belles of Transylvania, a pleasing variety.

PATHE.

THE RUNAWAY LEOPARD (Aug. 21).—Mr. Willy Babylas inherits a leopard from his uncle, who owns a menagerie. A little while after the leopard's arrival, he gets loose in the apartment house where Babylas lives and proceeds to investigate each floor. On the top he has fun with an artist; on the next floor he interrupts a dinner party; on the floor below he wakes up a couple in the arms of Morpheus; on the next he investigates a wallpaper hanger and his work, and finally winds up in a millinery shop, where the milliner keeps a monkey.

THROUGH THE WINDOW (Aug. 23).—A young couple, who are in love, but whose parents object to their marriage, elope. Two years pass and the unforgiving father still refuses even to speak to his daughter. Finally the young woman is left a widow and she writes to her mother, who takes her and her baby back to the old home. The baby is carried in the house by its grandmother; through the window the wretched widow watches her father play with her child and thus finally leads to a most touching reconciliation.

THE CHEYENNE'S BRIDE (Aug. 24).—The chief of the Sioux and the Cheyennes having fought a duel to the death, there is enmity between the tribes. In consequence, when the son of the Cheyenne chief woos a daughter of the Sioux he is taken prisoner by the men of the latter tribe and about to be killed. He is saved, however, by the girl's interference, but her chief contempt for her soft-heartedness and desiring to settle the matter, ties her on the back of a wild horse and selecting two other horses gives one to the Cheyenne and one to a Sioux, telling them that the one who catches the maid wins her. A most exciting picture ensues that everyone will enjoy.

NICK WINTER TURNS A TRICK (Aug. 25).—Nick Winter, the famous detective, is in the bank when he sees a burglary committed by a very slick gentleman. Quickly disguising himself, he plays the pickpocket and attempts to steal the man's watch. Of course he is promptly arrested and the police insist upon the near-victim accompanying the culprit to the police station. Here Nick Winter discloses his identity and Mr. Burglar gets his.

A BOY OF THE REVOLUTION (Aug. 26).—A Colonial soldier, trying to escape from the British, is hidden by a noncombatant and his little son in a hollow tree. The son carries the young fellow food and on one of his trips meets a British soldier, who demands what he is doing with the food. Finally, when forced by money and threats of death, the boy discloses the soldier's whereabouts and the poor fellow is captured and led away to be shot as a spy. Sick with remorse, however, the boy follows and ultimately succeeds in letting the man escape, while he dies in his stead.

MELIES.

A SPANISH LOVE SONG (Aug. 24).—Jack and Helen were engaged, much against their will, for it was mighty disagreeable to them both. In fact, Jack's displeasure was so ill-concealed that his father decided to send him across the border into Old Mexico, to learn common sense. Nothing could suit him better, although, of course, he did not let his happiness be known.

At an humble home in Mexico lived Juanita, a pretty guitar player and singer, who was forced by her parents to sing and beg on the streets for their support. Their treatment of her was cruel, and, adding insult to injury, they were using every means to get her to marry Don Jose, a wealthy Mexican, who loved her in his fierce fashion, but whom she thoroughly detested. On this occasion Don came to the house and pleaded for Juanita's hand, but she, defying them all, ran from the house. Don Jose followed her until she came to a lonely spot, when he grasped her tightly and endeavored to force his love upon her. Juanita fought desperately, but her strength soon failed so that she must needs be his unwilling victim, but for the timely arrival of Jack, now a cowboy, who was quick to grasp the situation and free Juanita. Don Jose departed swearing everlasting vengeance on the stranger, while Juanita remained to thank her champion.

From "A Spanish Love Song" (Melies).

It was love at first sight for Jack and Juanita, but their course, as usual, did not run smooth. Don Jose was not so easily outdone, and soon plotted against Jack. In a saloon he planned with his underlings, to unload Jack's gun and then waylay him on the road. Juanita, coming into the saloon to play, overheard the plot, and when they had gone, took a loaded gun from the bar and followed them. When the party set upon Jack, Don Jose raised his arm to strike with a knife, when a shot rang from the bushes and struck his wrist. The ruffians fled and Don Jose followed. Juanita's shot had saved her lover. There followed a pretty love scene.

When his happiness seemed to have reached its zenith, Jack received word from his father to return and prepare for his marriage with Helen. He returned, and Juanita, heartbroken, wandered across the border into San Antonio, determined never to return home. On the eve of Jack's wedding, word was received that Helen had eloped with the man she really loved. He was glad, yet sad, for he had left Juanita without explaining, lacking courage to tell her that he was all that time engaged. As he sat thinking, dejected, there came the strains from a guitar below. Could it be possible? He rushed to the front of the house, and there stood Juanita. She sang, and he responded to her "Spanish Love Song."

VITAGRAPH.

WAGES OF WAR (Aug. 21).—Col. Payson, of the Confederate Cavalry, halts a troop of passing Federal soldiers, mistaking it for Confederates, and is shot by one of them. He is brought into his house, where his son Maurice, swears that he will avenge his father's death. Lieutenant Ford, in command of the Northern cavalry, pays a visit to Payson's home and is deeply impressed by the beauty of Margaret. The death of her father and the enlisting of her brother, have so affected her, that she is on the verge of death. Her brother, while trying to get past the Union lines is shot and brought home. Margaret, to save her brother from the death she knows is due him, cuts her hair, and when Lieut. Ford arrives, is taken captive in place of him. She is just on the point of being shot, when Ford reaches the spot and stops the shooting. He commends the young girl for her bravery, and expresses his willingness to be under her command for the rest of his life.

HOW BETTY WON THE SCHOOL (Aug. 22).—Betty Carlton, a pretty girl, is sent to a girls' seminary. She is welcomed by all, and everything goes along merrily until one day, when they try to initiate Betty into one of their societies by blindfolding her and dropping cold, wet macaroni through her fingers. It feels so much like snakes that she dashes from the room. From now on she is ostracized. She decides to leave. While packing her trunk, she discovers a burglar climbing into a room where the other girls are having a "feed," to which she has not been invited. All the girls scream and run away. Betty, trusting to her lariat, enters the room, captures the burglar, and is thereby made a friend of all.

THE SHERIFF'S FRIEND (Aug. 23).—Duty places one under obligations which even friendships and our closest relations with others cannot destroy. Joe Cooper, when he accepted the nomination and was elected sheriff of his county, did not think that he would be called upon to prove this by the following unhappy circumstances:

Joe is very much in love with Lillie Rowe and a friend of her brother, Lincoln Rowe. Lincoln is of a quarrelsome and sullen disposition very hot tempered and obstinate—not taking kindly to a "jolly" and always ready to resent any opposition or interference.

In a fit of anger he kills a man and tries to escape from the clutches of the law by making all speed for the timbers. The friends of the dead man get together and notify the sheriff, Joe Cooper, who finds himself in a quandary between love and duty when he hears who the guilty man is, but declares the law shall be enforced.

At the head of the posse, Joe is seen in pursuit of the fugitive and naturally concludes that he has gone home. Finding Lillian Rowe alone, he tells her of her brother's crime, and, when she learns of this, she urges Joe to do his duty regardless of his relation to her. With a parting embrace, the sheriff rushes from the house and the posse are again on the trail of his sweetheart's brother, with whom they come in range and exchange a volley of shots, one from the sheriff's gun fatally wounds the escaping man, who, by a circuitous route reaches his home and falls dying. His sister tries to relieve his sufferings; Joe Cooper, with his vigilants, arrives on the scene. Joe enters the house, tenderly looks at the boy who grasps his hand, and tells his sister to forgive Joe, as he was only doing his duty in the name of the law. Bidding his sister farewell, the poor lad passes beyond the penalty of earthly courts.

Joe sympathetically extends his arms to Lillie, shares her sorrow, declaring his love and readiness to protect her from the world.

MY OLD DUTCH (Aug. 25).—"Dutch" is a nickname for wife among the costermongers of England, and is fraught with much endearment and the fullest appreciation of a woman considered the equal of any lady in the land. This particular "Dutch" and her husband are an old costermonger couple whose hearts are in the right place, and, like many of their kind, are greater than their judgments. If this be a fault at all, it is on the right side of the recorded virtues, which is strongly shown in the helping hand which they extend to Clive Huntley, a penniless artist whom the old costermonger finds in need of food and shelter.

Mrs. Bill Hawkins, with her kindly and motherly attention, nurses the man back to health and strength. Her services win the gratitude of their guest. It can be plainly seen that Clive Huntley is a man bred far above the environments by which he is now surrounded, but never has he come under kindlier influences or more generous hospitality.

By the death of a cousin Clieve inherits a large estate, the announcement of which is gratefully received by him, and rejoiced in by Mr. and Mrs. Bill Hawkins. The young artist is soon placed in possession of the necessary papers and funds to enable him to leave the home of his friends and take charge of his fortune.

The parting between the old couple and Clive is most affectionate and sincere. Some weeks later Bill Hawkins and his "Old Dutch" are approached by two scheming promoters with a get-rich-quick proposition, and the old couple are induced to invest their all in a wild-cat mining company, which, six months later, they find has gone the way of all such enterprises.

Ruin stares them in the face. The bailiffs come to serve dispossess papers upon them, and take away their meagre furnishings. What we have hoped for happens: Clive Huntley appears again upon the scene, stops the proceedings of the minions of the law by giving them a check for the full amount of their judgment, and Clive, now Sir Clive Huntley makes his presence known to his old friends and substantially acknowledges their beneficence to him by relieving them of all further anxiety as to their future livelihood; and the "bread cast upon the waters returns to them, after many days, ten-fold."

A HANDSOMER MAN (Aug. 26).—John is very jealous of his wife. He starts for his office in the morning in a huff. When he returns home, he finds a note on the table from his wife, saying that she has gone with a handsomer man, for an auto ride. Deciding to end it all, he rushes to his bureau drawer, takes out his revolver, and is on the point of pulling the trigger, when the telephone bell rings. He answers it and is surprised to hear his wife's voice, saying that she is out with her father, who called to take her for a ride. He sinks back into a chair and patiently awaits her arrival.

ITALA.

LOVE AND DISCIPLINE (Aug. 10).—The general's son becomes involved financially, and fearing exposure chooses death to dishonor. He writes a note to his sweetheart and she hurries to the barracks in an endeavor to stay his hand. The old quartermaster sergeant, however, has discovered the state of affairs, and sells his home to secure the money to save his general's boy. The despondent man is interrupted by the sergeant as he is about to shoot himself, and the girl arrives. A dramatic scene takes place between the lovers, and the old sergeant strikes the young man to distract him from his object. The general orders the sergeant arrested, and his son going to his desk finds the money and the delicately worded note. He secures the release of the sergeant, is enabled to meet his obligations, and marries the girl.

SPORT RESTORES YOUTH (Aug. 12).—A young man is the beneficiary in the will of an aged aunt, and being pestered by his creditors seeks to hasten her demise. To this end he persuades her that sport and exercise will restore her youth. He takes her through a series of violent exercises, boating, horseback riding, bicycle riding, etc., etc., and the result is that the old lady becomes more sprightly while the exertion and the mishaps which he suffers nearly kills him. He finally gives up, and finds that he has really prolonged the life of the woman.

A SIOUX SPY (Aug. 15).—Planning to take the warpath against the Cheyennes, the Sioux chief orders Brown Wolf to spy upon their camp and report their strength. Brown Wolf feigns illness and is taken into the Cheyenne village. He falls in love with Silver Moon, daughter of the Cheyenne chief, and is torn between affection and duty. Through another spy the Sioux chief learns of Brown Wolf's entanglement and swoops down upon the Cheyennes. Brown Wolf refuses to fight against his own people, but when Silver Moon's father's life is in danger he plunges into the fray. The Sioux are defeated and Brown Wlof wins a bride.

AN INDIAN LOVE AFFAIR (Aug. 18).—This is a four-cornered love story, in which Deerheart and Mona are lovers. Dove Eye is infatuated with Deerheart, and Eagle Wing is trying to win Dove Eye. Thrilling encounters take place between the men, and Dove Eye's father, the chief, has Deerheart arrested and tied to a stake. Finally, however, Dove Eye becomes satisfied that she can never win Deerheart's love, and turns to Eagle Wing. The prisoner is released and turned over to his sweetheart, while the old chief muses upon the strange ways of a woman's heart.

THE CANDLE OF LIFE (Aug. 16).—A wonderfully beautiful, artistic subject, showing a woman, disappointed in love, who retires to a convent. Standing before the altar of the Virgin she lights a candle, and as it burns she sees in the flame visions of the different stages of her life. When the candle has burned itself out she falls unconscious, and as the last flicker of the flame dies out the soul is seen to leave the body of the woman. This is a fascinating subject, depicted in most exquisite photography. On the same reel is

THE DREAD OF MICROBES (Aug. 16).—A short comedy, showing the actions of a man who is obsessed with an overpowering dread of the unseen microbes.

THE INDIAN'S LOVE (Aug. 26).—A chief's daughter is the boyhood friend of a tribal enemy and the girl's father forbids her to speak to him and threatens the boy with violence. The youngster's tribe departs toward the setting sun. The girl becomes a woman and is sought as a squaw by Jim Vulture, a half-breed gambler, whom she hates and fears. He is given her by her father in payment for a gambling debt. The boy, now a famous warrior, has recently met the girl and has tried to get her to join his tribe. Although she loves him, she is loyal to her people. The young warrior hearing of her being carried north by Vulture, follows on the trail and demands the girl. Vulture refuses and they battle for her. The Vulture is defeated and the young couple go to the tents of the warrior's people.

RELIANCE.

THE PITFALL (Aug. 12).—Beth and Ted, a country boy and girl, are betrothed, and are discovered in pretty love scenes. George, a city rake, is injured by his automobile and is found by the lovers, carried to the girl's home and nursed back to health. He makes love to the girl and she is dazzled by his handsome face, stylish clothes and polished manner. A quarrel takes place with Ted, and the father orders George away. He lures Beth to the city under promise of marriage, but soon betrays his true character. Beth writes to her father expressing her regret, and Ted goes to the city to take her back. He arrives at an opportune time, and a frightened, thoroughly disillusioned little girl flies to his protecting arms.

THANHOUSER.

THE CROSS (Aug. 22).—"The mistakes that doctors make are buried in the ground," W. S. Meriwether, the nautical writer says. "Those made by lawyers are paid for by their clients, but the mistakes of sea captains are paid for by themselves, and bitter is the price."

The captain in our story pays such a price. With one officer sick, he is standing watch with his first mate, when his love for drink leads him to neglect his duty. While the ship is plunging to destruction, the captain, who should have been on the bridge, is below in his stateroom, helplessly intoxicated. The ship founders, and the captain and his first mate are the only ones who are saved.

The luckless commander is placed on trial for the deaths of his men. The evidence of his mate counts heavily against him, and he is sent to prison for a term of years. His wife, who stands by him during the trial, prays for him in vain, and when the jury returns its verdict, she hands him her golden cross, hoping that in his cell he may yet find comfort and consolation in religion.

The cross, which is taken from him when he is received at the prison, is restored to him on his release. He is then broken hearted and embittered. His wife has died during his absence, his prospects are blighted, and the only thing that keeps him up, is a desire to be revenged upon the man he unjustly blames for his misfortunes.

So he hunts him out, and when they meet, he greets the mate with every evidence of friendship. The mate, a good-hearted chap, is sorry for his old commander, and only too ready to extend him a helping hand. He invites him to his home, and it is his intention to see that the captain's remaining days are free from care and worry.

Although the captain is cunning enough to conceal from the mate his feeling of fanatic hatred, his secret is partially revealed to a visitor at the mate's home, the parish priest. The clergyman meets him at the mate's home, and the captain's conduct worried him. The priest leaves the house in deep thought. He ponders over the problem on his way home, then decides to return to the house. He is just in time to save the mate's life, the captain being about to kill him.

When the priest suddenly appears before the captain, holding out the cross toward him, the would-be assassin thinks of his wife, and for the first time realizes the crime he would commit. He sees that the punishment he has suffered is the consequence of his own fault, and he sinks at the priest's feet, begging forgiveness for the crime he had been about to commit.

The priest, finding that his repentance is sincere, secures him a refuge in a monastery. There, by prayers and good deeds, he is trying to atone for the faults he committed in this world, so that he may meet the one he loved in eternity.

THE ROMANCE OF LONELY ISLAND (Aug. 25).—A successful young author has sketched out a book which hugely pleases his publishers, but the trouble is that he cannot seem to write it. He knows what he wants to say, and just how to say it, but he is annoyed by callers, who bother him on all sorts of subjects. Finally in despair he decides to go into the wilderness, where no one can annoy him. He owns a little islet, known as Lonely Island, and there he goes determined to spend the summer in solitude, and complete his work.

The first thing he does is to put up a sign, warning all trespassers not to land. Then he lives a happy outdoor life, and congratulates himself on the success of his plan.

If a certain pretty young woman had been an accomplished sailor, or rather "sailoress" the solitude of the island's owner might never have been disturbed. But this girl, who generally had her own way, decides to sail a boat, and induces an old boatman to let her take one of his crafts out all alone.

Of course she upsets the boat, but with her usual luck, is not drowned. She managed to clamber to the top of the overturned boat, and placidly waits future developments, confident that everything will come out all right. And although Cupid has never been pictured as a Sea God, it must have been him who guides the vessel to Lonely Island.

The girl gets ashore there, and after a very brief investigation finds a cute little camp, where she discovers dry clothes and warm drink and food. So she makes herself very much at home, and when the rightful owner came along, she greets him pleasantly. She offers him some coffee, and when he sullenly refuses she gives him one of his own blankets, and tells him he can sleep out under the trees. Then she placidly goes to sleep in his comfortable tent. In the morning she provides an excellent hot breakfast, made from his own provisions, and when rescue comes a little later thanks him for his delightful hospitality, and sails away, as placidly content as ever.

The girl does not know that she has been a nuisance. And the more the man thinks about it, the more he believes that she was not. For the average man likes to be bossed gently, although he may not always admit that such is the fact.

The young author decides to see the girl again. He calls, she receives him pleasantly. He becomes more and more impressed. And then—well

There used to be a sign on Lonely Island reading, "TRESPASSERS, KEEP OFF." But the girl who always has her own way superintends the installation of a new sign, which reads, "This Island for Sale." For the young author has decided that loneliness is no longer to be a part of his life, and that when the right girl comes along, it is time for a man to buy an engagement ring.

AS A BOY DREAMS (Aug. 24).—Jack Howard, a typical American boy, is addicted to reading literature of the yellow-backed variety, despite the admonitions of his father. One day he dozes off to sleep, after devouring a thrilling story of the sea. The story of his dream is told in detail.

While walking on the dock he is seized upon by some sailors and shanghaied in the most approved manner, being taken aboard a ship bound on a long cruise. He is secreted and overhears a plot of the sailors to mutiny, seize the ship and sail to a desert island in search of a treasure. One of the sailors produces a chart of the island and the tars leave the forecastle. Jack comes on, takes possession of the paper and is joined by the winsome daughter of the captain. It is a case of love at first sight. He shows her the chart and she takes him to her father, where he discloses the plot of the mutineers.

The desperate men attack the captain and the loyal members of the crew and there is a fierce fight. Jack saves the captain's daughter, who escapes with him in the garb of a boy. They take possession of a small boat and put to sea, where they are captured by pirates. The sex of the girl is discovered, but Jack secures immunity for himself and fair companion by showing the pirates the chart of the treasure island.

The pirates go to the island, taking Jack and the girl with them, unearth the treasure and are jubilant, but their joy is short-lived, as they are in turn set upon by another gang of pirates and the struggle is a bloody one. Jack and the girl are subsequently rescued from the pirates by the father of the girl and his gallant crew and taken aboard his ship together with the treasure, which is Jack's by right of having the chart. Jack asks the captain for the hand of the daughter and the mariner is only too pleased at the prospect of the union. They are wed and Jack awakens to find it all a dream and he is in despair.

His reflections are rudely broken into by his father, who hauls him out of the garret and sets him at the irksome task of sawing wood.

BATTLE OF THE WILLS (Aug. 21).—Laura Danvers, a handsome young woman, is the betrothed of Dr. Roy Crawford, a young physician who is practising in the West. She is also loved by Pierre Rameau, a hypnotist, who places the girl under his influence at will, enjoying the diversion.

Doctor Crawford comes for the girl to take her to his home and make her his bride. He leaves the room, forgetting his hat, after being repulsed by Laura, who is under the spell exerted over her by the unprincipled Rameau. He upbraids his sweetheart, whose sudden revulsion of feeling has mystified him. Going out he sees Rameau, through the French window in the act of bringing Laura once more under his influence.

It all dawns upon the young physician and he hastily returns and throttles Rameau, threatening to kill him, but Laura interferes. She has regained her senses and Dr. Raymond announces that he has made a study of hypnotism, and not being clear as to the relations between Laura and Rameau, he forces him to enter into a contest to see which possesses the greater power. The two men exert their influence and Laura is attracted to her sweetheart and he takes her in his arms. Bidding her leave the room, Crawford hypnotizes the Frenchman and leaves him writhing in agony.

LOVE IN A TEPEE (Aug. 21).—Hyacinth is the beautiful daughter of old Bad Eye, a dissolute Indian. The girl is loved by Jack, a dashing young cowboy, and Manuel, a Mexican. She loves the cowboy and hates the greaser. Bay Eye spends the major portion of his time at a groggery and Manuel buys him drinks, being the favored suitor for the hand of the daughter. Hyacinth repulses Manuel and he resolves to abduct, take her to his tepee and compel her to love him.

Bad Eye returns to his tent and routs the girl out of the cot, rolls up in the blankets and proceeds to sleep off the effects of his debauch. Hyacinth goes to find her cowboy lover.

In the meantime Manuel repairs to the tepee and, seeing Bad Eye sleeping, proceeds to carry out his purpose. Stealthily stealing in, he takes the old Indian, wrapped in the blanket, and places him on his horse and gallops furiously away.

Jack and Hyacinth start out to find her father, missing him from the tent, and they are led to the home of Manuel. Peeping in they see the Mexican in the act of awakening the sleeping form which he supposes is that of the girl. Old Bad Eye rolls out and immediately asks for whiskey and Manuel is given the laugh by Jack and his sweetheart, who are unable to suppress their merriment.

ECLAIR.

THE EDELWEISS (Aug. 21).—Lives are risked daily in pursuit of pleasure, more often to acquire little things of insignificant value.

Louise loved rare flowers, particularly the much-valued Edelweiss, to secure which many lives had been risked and sacrificed.

She had heard and read of these rare flowers and, now that her family were in the vicinity of the mountains, was determined to have a large bouquet for her very own.

Her parents strenuously objected to an ascent of the mountain peak, but suggest sending Henry, the girl's fiance. But Henry is subject to fits of giddiness and refuses to go, until chided by Louise for his lack of bravery. Part way up the mountain, Henry luckily meets a guide returning from a similar quest and succeeds in purchasing a part of his flowers. Then he returns in triumph to Louise, who is greatly overjoyed. His pleasure is short-lived, however, for suddenly the guide appears and accuses Henry of giving him a spurious coin. Louise is much enraged and decides to make the journey herself, accompanied by the guide from whom Henry made his purchase.

The latter, heartily ashamed of himself, determines to redeem if possible his lost ground, and hurriedly takes another path towards the same goal. Fortunately Henry reaches there first and is able to surprise Louise when she arrives. She accepts his offering of Edelweiss and all is forgiven.

HOW THEY WORK IN CINEMA (Aug. 21).—Dissatisfied with the new director, all employees of a large motion picture enterprise decide to go on a strike. In spite of entreaties they leave the studio in a body, thinking to cripple the concern. But the ingenious director was prepared for ever emergency, and by means of a wonderful electrical invention demonstrated his ability to stage an entire production without the aid of human assistance.

Automatically the stage is prepared for a scene while furniture fittings and decorations mysteriously take their proper places.

Mechanically perfect artists appear before the camera and enact the drama. In short the picture is finally made in time for release on the advertised date.

NESTOR.

HANDS ACROSS THE CRADLE (Aug. 16).—Happily the two old comrades clasped hands, for Colonel Clay and Major Wells had soldiered side by side in the Civil War, and ever since had been friends and neighbors. Now their fondesst hopes were about to be realized in the marriage of their son and daughter.

Unfortunately, however, ere Kitty had half-completed her trousseau, her father received a letter from his attorney, stating that the tract of land sold by Colonel Clay to the railroad company, for the proposed cut-off, would bring the road-bed within two hundred yards of his house.

Surprised and angry that his neighbor had not found this out before selling his property, the major hurried over to the Clay home, where, owing to the high temper of the two veterans, a stormy interview took place, ending in the major throwing away his daughter's engagement ring and forbidding Robert the house.

It was then that the women decided to take a hand; so, while Kitty and Robert were planning their future, Mrs. Clay and Mrs. Wells hastily made arrangements for their children to be married that night and as soon as they were made man and wife, quietly escorted them to the train, which was to carry the bride and the groom to their new home.

Two years passed, yet, despite the pleadings of their wives, and even the mention of a little grandson in the letters from Kitty and Robert, the old comrades remained obstinate.

Urged by their own home sickness, as well as by the wishes of their mothers, the young people were only too glad to return when they learned from Robert's agent that he had been able to purchase the little cottage for them adjoining the Clay property.

The day after their arrival, unable to resist the temptation of taking just one peep at what Mrs. Wells termed "that blessed baby," the Major, after assuring himself that his daughter and her husband were not in the house, stole softly into the cottage and had already won the marked approval of the tiny boy when he heard someone approaching. Slipping behind a screen, the Major was dumbfounded to behold his neighbor, evidently bent upon the same errand as himself.

Coming down to the Colonel, as he bent over the little chap, the Major silently held out his hand, which when he recovered from his surprise was only too gladly clasped by the old time comrade.

MUTT AND JEFF IN THE BANKING BUSINESS (Aug. 19).—At last the two inseparables, Mutt and Jeff, have struck it rich. They have real money, and, as is often the case with people unaccustomed to hear the joyful jingling of the "vile metal" or feel the cold-warm touch of the "mazuma," neither Mutt nor Jeff knows what to do with their suddenly acquired riches. Being on Easy Street for the time being, they plan innumerable plans to remain on that comfortable road for the balance of their mortal existence.

Mutt, whose "thinkatorial" apparatus is of the quick lunch order, is the recipient of one light-ning inspiration after another, which rotund little Jeff dashes to the ground in his stubborn, slow manner. Mutt finally asserts his six feet or more of lissome build—for no regiment of Jeffs can tell him that there is anything more profitable than the banking business. Reluctantly the little fellow joins his tall partner in a banking venture, hoping against hope that the enterprise might prove a success.

Depositors are hard to find; at least none stray into the banking office of Mutt and Jeff Co. This lack, however, is more than made up by clients wanting to borrow money for a limited length of time and offering big bonuses and splendid real estate for security. No such golden opportunity can give Mutt the go-by. Brushing aside his little partner's objections Mutt quickly lends off all the bank's cash, and already rejoices over the big haul he soon expects to make.

Borrowers, as a rule, are very forgetful folks, and the ones who clean out the Mutt and Jeff bank are the rule and not the exception—they are even worse, as Mutt finds out when, tired of waiting for the return of the bank's money together with the alluring bonuses, he decides to go and take possession of the mythical land, houses, etc., given as security. The bank is busted, Mutt is busted and Jeff is both busted and sore. Stunned by the sudden termination of his dream of gold, poor Mutt fails to see the frowning countenance of his diminutive chum, and from somewhere, somehow, comes another unexpected blow, and, alas! the tall ex-banker is busted again!

SOLAX.

THE PHONEY RING (Aug. 16).—Mary is industriously scrubbing the office floor as Mr. Franklin, her boss, enters. Seeing what a good worker Mary is, Franklin decides to give her a present. He buys a cheap ring, and leaving it on his desk as he goes to the outer office, his wife enters, and, seeing the ring, and thinking that it is for her birthday present, slips it in her bag. When Franklin gets home he is surprised at the greeting which he receives from his wife and upon asking her the cause for her affectionate demonstrations, is told how thankful she is for his thoughtfulness. Mr. Franklin can hardly contain himself with mirth, and as Mrs. Franklin gives a party to her friends to show off her new jewelry, Mr. Franklin rushes out of the house to get a good ring to take the place of the cheap one. He returns, but not in time for the party. Mrs. Franklin's friends laugh at her telling her the ring is paste and in a rage she throws the ring on the table. Franklin puts the good ring in the place of the other, but Mrs. Franklin, not knowing of the change, takes the ring and throws it out of the window. After many experiences, the ring is finally returned to its rightful owner, and Mrs. Franklin is again made happy.

LET NOT MAN PUT ASUNDER (Aug. 18).—The story opens with a court room scene, showing a divorce case in progress. John Mills gets a divorce from his wife, Mary, and the court decides to give his son into his care, while the mother is given the little daughter. Mary and daughter go back to their old home in the country while father and son stay in the city. The children divide their toys, among which are two white pigeons. Time passes and Mary's old mother dies. The shock proving too much for poor Mary, she is taken ill and is at the point of death. Little Helen is shown sitting sadly by the bedside of her dying motber, not knowing what to do. Finally we see her sad little face light up with a bright idea. She takes her little pigeon and tying a note to its leg, lets it out of the window.

Mr. Mills is shown sitting sadly in his city home with his son by his knee. His attention is attracted by a tapping on the window, and arising and opening the window he is surprised to see a pure white dove flutter into the room. Taking the bird in his hands he finds a note written in a childish hand and addressed to him. The note is an appeal for help from his little daughter. Heartbroken at the condition in which he sees his family is placed, he gets the first train to his wife and child. During a pretty scene the family is happily reunited.

CHAMPION.

WHEN NORTH AND SOUTH MET (Aug. 21).—The battle of Manassas Junction has gone down in history as most remarkable in many respects. In the first of the two great battles, both sides were new to the terrors of war and the flame of conflict, yet never was struggle more gallantly maintained nor carried on with more martial ardor. But in that first great scene of slaughter, something terrible happened. The Northern troops, right in the flush of victory, were stampeded like sheep—were driven across Bull's Run, on through Centerville and into the city of Washington. The battle has gone down in history as Bull's Run; it was dubbed facetiously by a French writer as Cow's Run.

In this film story, Harry Hilton is a participant on this famous field where so many deeds of daring and heroism took place. Harry was no exception in this respect for at the risk of his own life, he saved that of a gallant Confederate lieutenant, and these two became fast friends forever more.

But after many terrible encounters, Harry himself was mortally wounded on this bloody field of Chantilly; and the fortunes of war had so ordained that his last dying breath was gasped forth on the bosom of that man whose life he had saved at the begining of the great strife. And into the keeping of this brave lieutenant Harry gave letters and keepsakes for his precious mother and sister up in the North. And then, when the war ended, the lieutenant came. Grace Hilton imaged her brother in the eyes of the handsome Southern officer, and the love that had grown in his bosom for the dead youth, was now flamed into a passion for the sister, who was pure and holy.

THE CONFESSIONAL (Aug. 23).—The aristocratic parents were opposed to the obscure clergyman, and only reluctantly assented to his attentions towards their daughter. On a certain day, in their beautiful suburban village, a daring robbery was attempted and one of the culprits took refuge in the rectory—the clergyman's home. In chasing the robbers, the girl's father found a robber's mask on the steps of the rectory but could not gain entrance thereto.

His suspicions were aroused, and finding that the old gentleman, whose home was entered, had been wounded, he got the vestry together, be called on the clergyman for an explanation of the "mask mystery," or the latter's resignation. During the controversy, his eyes lighted on a revolver with one chamber discharged. Slipping away, he sought the wounded man's home, and borrowing the bullet, which had been extracted from his wound, he found that it fitted the revolver.

He now confronted the young clergyman with this double proof of knowledge of the affair. The latter refused to utter a word, saying his lips were sealed by "the seal of the confessional." The young girl now demanded a clean breast of it or to cancel their engagement. His only answer was that under the seal he was protecting "a brother." He didn't tell her that it was her brother whose confession he had heard and who was now on his way West, to grow up a better man.

After the break, the clergyman, upheld by his Bishop, went to a Western mission. The boy, in the meantime, had become a ranch foreman, and was soon to marry the daughter of the ranch owner, whose life he had saved from bandits. The happy sequel was to find fruition in this marriage, to which the young man's parents and sisters had been invited.

All are now present. The priest arrived to officiate—but, the father and daughter pointed the finger of scorn at him. But the bridegroom stepped forward and exonerated him, at the same time confessing his part in the affair. Father and daughter now appeal to the priest for pardon. The daughter would throw herself into his arms, but it is too late. He had taken the vow of celibacy. His bride was the Church. He then tied the knot for the happy couple.

GREAT NORTHERN.

THE VICTORY OF LOVE (Aug. 19).—Two partners in business have to admit to one another that prospects look very black for them, and that they are on the eve of bankruptcy. A former associate, to whom they owe considerable money, writes that he will forogo his claim if the hand of the daughter of one of the partners is given him in marriage. The partner pleads that the match be brought about, but the father resists his persuasions, and at home is on the point of committing suicide, when the daughter comes in. Seeing what he is about to do, she rushes forward, and he finally shows her the letter. An aunt brings her powers of persuation to bear, and the girl, although she has a sweetheart, consents to marry the suitor, realizing that by her doing so she will save her father from ruin. All preparations for the wedding have just been completed, and the ceremony is about to take place, when the real lover arrives. He creates a scene, and attempts to end his life, but fortunately only inflicts a slight wound. The girl's father, seeing her distress, determines that she shall have the man she loves, and resolutely calls off the wedding, giving his blessing to the true lovers, and avowing that he will get out of his troubles as a man should.

YANKEE.

COLLEEN BAWN (Aug. 21).—A film portraying the famous Irish story, exactly as produced by Dion Boucicault and Laura Keene, in 1860.

COLLEEN BAWN.

Oh, Limerick is beautiful as everybody knows,
The River Shannon full of fish, beside that city flows:
But it is not the river, nor the fish that preys upon my mind,
Nor with the town of Limerick have I any fault to find.
The girl I love is beautiful, she's fairer than the dawn;

She llves in Garryowen, and she's called the Colleen Bawn.
As the river, proud and bold, goes by that famed city,
So proud and cold, without a word, that Colleen goes by me!
Oh, hone! Oh, hone!

Oh, if I was the Emperor of Russia to command,
Or Julius Cæsar, or the Lord Lieutenant of the land,
I'd give up all my wealth, my manes, I'd give up my army,
Both the horses, the fut, and the royal artillery:
I'd give the crown from off my head, the people on their knees,
I'd give my fleet of salling ships upon the briny seas,
And a beggar I'd go to sleep, a happy man at dawn,
If by my side, fast for my bride, I'd the darlin' Colleen Bawn.
Oh, hone! Oh, hone!

RETALIATION (Aug. 25).—Unable to wreak her vengeance upon the artist who spurned her and married another, she waits five long years with the memory of the insult fresh in her mind, she seeks other channels and strikes at him through his younger brother.

The former model has become a famous actress, and among the playwrights who seek her is the brother of the man who had spurned her. It is an easy matter for the famous actress to make a slave of the young author and when he has introduced her to his family as his fiancée she meets the elder brother, now a happily married man, and tells him that she is only playing with the affections of his younger brother. "As you have made me suffer, I shall make you suffer through the love you hear for your brother; as you cast me off, so shall I cast him off."

The innocent victim of this woman'e vengeful spirit is an unwilling listener to this denouncement, and, realizing how his life has been blasted by his love for this woman, falls unconscious at her feet.

BILL TRIES TO MAKE BREAD (Aug. 18).—Bill learns with great dismay that the bakers of Paris are on strike, and after receiving practical proof that it is impossible to obtain even a small quantity of the "staff of life," he determines to make his own bread. With that object in view, Bill purchases two large bundles of wheat, and returning to his room, commences to wield a flail with all his might. Unfortunately his energy results in a portion of the flool giving way, much to the discomfort and annoyance of the occupants of the room below—a choleric old gentleman and his pretty daughter. The former expostulates with Bill, who, by the way of reply, puffs a quantity of flour in his direction and father and daughter beat a hasty retreat. To add to their troubles, Bill commences to add water for the purpose of kneading, aud a cooling shower descends upon the unlucky pair. Two policemen are hastily summoned, and the party descend upon Bill, who manages to liberally bespatter everything and everybody with paste before he is marched off to the station.

A CHILD'S COURAGEOUS ACT (Aug. 18).—Two thieves plot to possess themselves of a consignment of money which is being sent by train. Thev accordingly present themselves at a lonely house on the line, kept by a woman who works the signals, and ask for shelter. They are admitted and presently, while the signal woman is dozing in her chair, they attack her and leave her senseless on the floor; not, however, without the incident being witnessed by their victim's little daughter, who stealthily creeps from the house without attracting their notice. The villains then proceed to the railway line, where they lay an enormous log across the track, with the intention of wrecking the train. Meanwhile the child has gone to meet the express, whish she knows is due. Standing in front of the advancing engine without flinching, she succeeds in bringing the train to a standstill, and, in response to the angry questions of the driver and passengers, she leads them to the spot where the trap has been prepared. The robbers are discovered hiding in a thicket nearby and are quickly captured, while the little one is taken home to her mother, who is rescued from her plight by the grateful travelers the child has saved.

Two Fools and Their Follies

Scene from TWO FOOLS AND THEIR FOLLIES

WHAT is worse than an old fool? Two old fools. Texas John and his wife were elected. To the city she went shopping and wore back a Harem-Skarem. At home he remained and "treated the boys." The mixup that took place on their meeting forms a clever comedy that will prove a great mirth winner.

Length 550 ft.

ON SAME REEL

The Local Bully

"ROARING BILL" was the terror of Black Bear Gulch, and everyone held him in fear until one John Grey, a salesman, came to town and took the bully down a peg or two. It was a case of a Westerner's brute strength overcome by an Eastener's wit.

A set of seven photos of our leading players $1.00.

No moving picture film ever made such an instantaneous hit with state rights buyers as

THE CRUSADERS

or Jerusalem Delivered

(Copyright 1911 World's Best Film Co.)

It is about the only great film that cannot be criticised from any standpoint, either by police censors or churchmen. Every exchange man, every exhibitor, every theatrical man who has seen it agrees that this film is an

and that no such scenic display, no such acting, no such photography has ever been grouped in one film before. Owners of state rights are being fairly swamped with requests for bookings. In fact it almost books itself and will continue to be a feature for years.

States Are Selling Fast

We wish once more to urge upon you the advisability of acting quickly if you hope to secure state rights. If you cannot handle the deal alone, organize a company of business men in your town and raise the money in that way. Once you own state rights you are protected for 28 years by the new copyright law. You can book at your leisure, for no one can interfere in your territory.

Remember, We Help You

We have already had the most strikingly beautiful 8-sheet posters made; also two styles of one-sheets; as well as banners, heralds, dodgers and other publicity matter. We have paved the way as smoothly as possible for you. It now remains for you to take action before the states you want are sold. First come, first served.

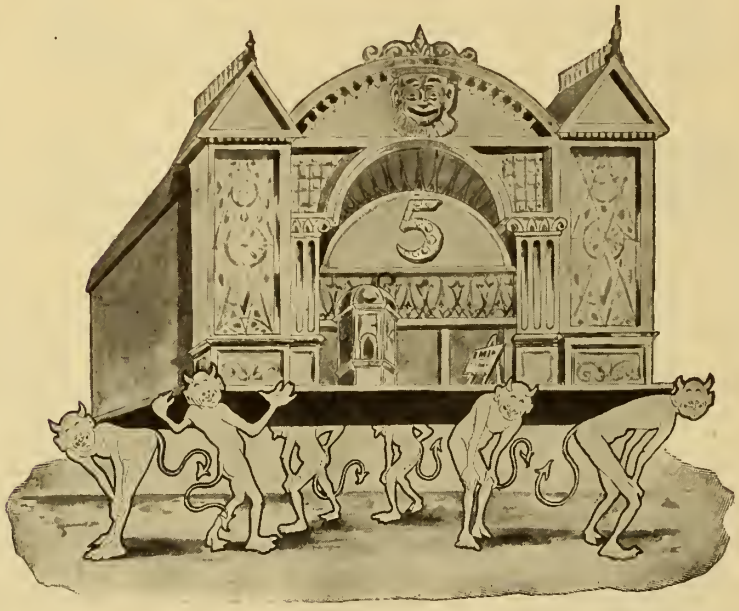
IMPS Will Support Your Theatre



You ought to know as well as we do that the more Imps you use the bigger business you'll do. This being the case, how can you rest easily until you've got your exchange into the habit of sending you TWO Imps every blessed week of the year? Give this a little serious thought and then get busy. See what's coming now:—

"BATTLE OF THE WILLS"

(Copyright 1911, I. M. P. Co.)

One of the most unique half-reels we ever produced; the sort that makes people talk and think long after they've seen the film. Read the synopsis carefully. On the same reel you'll get a comedy called

"LOVE IN A TEPEE"

(Copyright 1911, I. M. P. Co.)

which looks like a genuine out-and-out "Western" film at first, but winds up in a scream. Go after it. This and the "Battle of the Wills" will be released Monday, August 21.

"AS A BOY DREAMS"

(Copyright 1911, I. M. P. Co.)

This is simply great! Read the synopsis and see if this boy's dreams are not exactly like the ones you used to have when you were a kid. See if this film doesn't carry you back to your wild and woolly days when you thought you were a regular devil of a hero. No better Imp than this was ever made. Go after it hammer and tongs. It will be released THURSDAY, August 24.

On one reel

"THE PROFESSOR AND THE NEW HAT"

CAST.

The Professor.....William West
His Daughter.....Mary Fuller
Her Lover.....Edwin Clarke

A charming little story of an absent-minded professor, his daughter and her young man. A refreshing light comedy.

"THE QUESTION MARK"

CAST.

Jimmy.....Yale Boss
His Father.....William Bechtel
His Mother.....Laura Sawyer
The Servant.....Marie Tener
The Iceman.....Edward O'Connor

A comedy full of laughs from beginning to end. The young hopeful succeeds in pretty well upsetting the whole household.

Saturday, August 26th

"TWO WHITE ROSES"

CAST.

An Old Bachelor.....Wadsworth Harris
His Nephew.....Edward Boulden
A Maiden Lady.....Mrs. Wallace Erskine
Her Niece.....Elsie McLeod

A light comedy, thoroughly entertaining. It shows how a marriage personal in the newspaper leads to happy but surprising results.

Friday, August 25th

"THEN YOU'LL REMEMBER ME"

CAST.

John Grayson, afterwards known as Henry Waters.....Sydney Booth
His Wife.....Miriam Nesbitt

This is a story of unusual strength, superbly played. A man's memory lost because of an accident at sea, is restored to him through hearing the song his wife sang when they were first married. A feature film in every sense.

Motion Picture Exhibitors League of America recognize the remarkable advancement and originality shown by the Independent manufacturers whose product we sell.

Not only are our film stories pronounced instructive from a Historical, Scientific and Biographical standpoint, but also affording the greatest amount of real pleasure and comfort to all that view them.

A larger and better variety of high-class brands to select from than the following weekly program cannot be found anywhere in the United States and Canada.

Many Trust exhibitors who attended the National Convention of the Moving Picture Exhibitors League of America at Cleveland last week had not seen any of the Sales Company's recent releases. All were enthusiastic in their praises and a great number of them openly stated that they had been waiting for just such evidence of quality before finally throwing off the yoke of the Trust.

WAR! and LOVE!

The two most thrilling elements of all human emotions infused into a Rex Picture. And if "all is fair in love and war," what can be a more appropriate setting for a picture of love and war than a military post? Rex actually has part of

APPEARING IN

"The Colonel's Daughter"

Released Thursday, August 17th

All the world loves a lover—except his rival. And the rival in this picture almost made "The Colonel's Daughter" doubt the truth and trust of the man she loved. ALMOST—for the end is love redeemed and the beginning of a new Reign of Cupid and a new epoch in romantic pictures.

We could almost write poetry about it—thusly:

No live, wise exhibitor oughter
Fail to get "The Colonel's Daughter."

As the Operator Looks at it

As the Operator Looks at It

Just notice how easy this operator takes it. He doesn't have to work over a dangerous juice consuming rheostat at furnace heat anymore since the was installed.

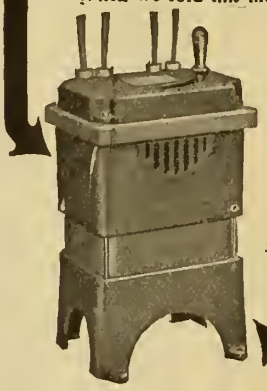
He can control the machine perfectly now with one hand--gets a clearer, whiter, steadier light and can adjust it to any of the three intensities without even the faintest flicker.

When we sold this machine we guaranteed it would absolutely



Cut 2-3 from the Monthly Lighting Bill

That sounded almost too good to be true, but they put one in on our 30 day free trial plan.

Did the machine "make good?" Well, the first month it reduced the bill from $22.70 to $9.24 and they operated more hours and got better light than ever before.

We can do just as well for you regardless of what voltage you are using and if you will send for our little free booklet, we'll explain how we do it.

Remember you are paying the Lighting Company 66 2-3 per cent more than you need to every day you wait.

KEEP YOUR DRUM HEADS DRY

The very nature of drum heads causes them to absorb moisture readily, and when the heads become damp it is an absolute certainty that your drum will lose its brilliancy.

Our latest invention, the Electric Drum Heater, entirely overcomes this difficulty, for by its use you can keep your drum brilliant and snappy regardless of the weather.

This device can be attached to any drum and the connecting plug will fit any ordinary 110-volt incandescent lamp socket. It gives no light; never burns out; may be turned on and off at will, or if desired, entirely removed in a few seconds time. Entire outfit, including the Heater proper, two connecting plugs, and six feet of cord, weighs eight ounces—the Heater but two. It is practically indestructible and can easily be carried in your drum case.

Be sure and say whether you wish it for Snare Drum, Bass Drum, or Tympani, as each instrument requires a different strength.

Try one—your money back if you are not entirely satisfied

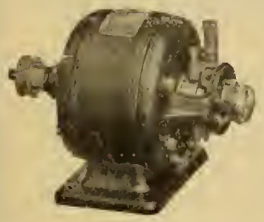
My Picture is 100% Steadier



Read what E. M. Hammond, operator of the Porterville, California, Opera House says about Kimble M. P. Machine Motors.

"PORTERVILLE, CALIF.,
JULY 7, 1911.

KIMBLE ELECTRIC CO.,
1118 Washington Boul.,
Chicago, Ill.

Gentlemen:

Enclosed find a photo showing how I have my Kimble connected up to a 'Powers No. 5.' I have it bolted direct to the fly wheel with a flat belt twisted once, and an idler in between to take up slack when it is necessary to frame up or down.

I always look for your ads in the M. P. WORLD, and I think if more managers would heed what you say, especially in the July 8th issue, and install a Kimble to run their machines, they would be surprised at the results.

My picture is 100% steadier and safer since I put in the motor; therefore, you see I would not be without it.

I purchased the motor of you through Mr. J. H. Hallberg, of New York City, about three months ago, and it has never had to have any repairs or attention up to date."

The steadiest hand at the crank cannot produce half as steady or even a picture as the KIMBLE M. P. Machine Motor makes, and when you drive with a motor, both the operator's hands are left free to do "stunts" that will surprise the audience and mystify competitors.

The Kimble M. P. Machine Motor is the only variable speed alternating current motor on the market. It varies, not by steps, but imperceptibly from 300 to 3,000 R. P. M. and permits delicate shadings under the operator's absolute control.

Hitch it to the light socket. It uses less current than a 16 c. p. light.

The Edison Projecting Kinetoscope

IT is significant that almost invariably when an exhibitor discontinues one machine and purchases another, his last choice is the Edison. Does this not prove that although his judgment may have been faulty originally, he has seen the error of his ways and is convinced that the only safe, economical and satisfactory way to operate a motion picture theatre is to choose a machine that has been considered standard the world over ever since its introduction fifteen or more years ago.

TRADE MARK

THE Edison Underwriters' Type "B" Model Kinetoscope with outside revolving shutter, today stands absolutely without a near competitor, as the machine that projects the rock-steady, flickerless, sharp pictures photoplay audiences admire—the machine which never fails at the most inopportune moment.

Are You Going To Be First, or Last?

Since placing our system for displaying programmes before the exhibitors of motion pictures, we have been more than surprised the way orders have been coming in from live exhibitors all over the country asking that we furnish them with our system at once, as they desire to be the first to put on this high class advertising in their locality.

THERE-IS-A-REASON

for this, as a good live wire knows that by introducing a class of advertising of so high a character that he is bound to get the business away from his competitor who is still plodding along in the same old fashioned way of using unsightly posters and smearing the front of his theatre all over with paste.

The fellow who takes time for doing things, is a lazy cousin to the fellow who does time for taking things

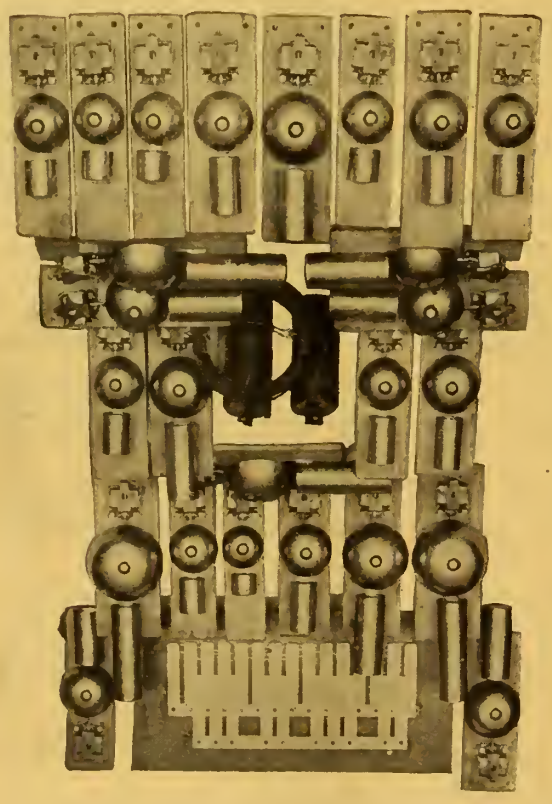
DEAGAN BELLS

They are a real attraction and will increase your patronage at once.



See here what one exhibitor says:

The Electric Saucer Bells arrived all O.K. on Friday and we had them installed in our Theatre and started them on Sunday following, and it is our pleasure to inform you that they have given the utmost satisfaction. Our audience was wild with enthusiasm. The installing of the bells increased our patronage at once. They are classy and add quality to any theatre.

JACOBI & FLETCHER,
IDLE HOUR THEATRE,
SHEBOYGAN, WIS.

Deagan's Musical Electrical Bells are made of finest bell metal, as per our own formula, and are fitted with our Patent resonaters which add fully 100% to the tone of the Bells as well as making the sound sweet, clear and silvery.

The Bells are played from a key board, same as a piano, and any one can play them with a few minutes' practise. They are correctly tuned to your piano, and can be played as a solo instrument, with or without piano accompaniment, as an accompaniment to songs, during intermission, etc.

The key board can be placed in any desired location and the bells be mounted in any part of the house, on the ceiling, side walls, under seats, corners, odd places, etc., producing the most startling effects to endless surprise and delight of the audience.

Any person can install a set of these Bells in a few hours; no experience is necessary, as complete instructions are included with each set.

We can supply you a complete outfit of these marvellous Bells for $40.00 and up.

Don't miss this opportunity. Write to day for terms and catalogues.

Power's Cameragraph No. 6

"Mena, Arkansas,
"Aug. 10, 1911.

"Nicholas Power Co.,
"New York.

"Gentlemen:—

"The Power's No. 6 arrived Monday and is now installed and I want to tell you that I am what Eli Perkins called a 'damphool' for not installing one sooner; it is marvelous and has already caused lots of talk and increased my patronage.

"Before installing it I made arrangements with one of the local merchants and had it on exhibition in the show window, where I personally explained the fine points and told them The Lyric always believed in giving the best for the money.

"You can rest assured I will always boost your No. 6.

"Yours truly,
"(Signed) S. A. ARNOLD."

"Dear Sirs:—

"After running your No. 6 machine six months, I took it apart and re-assembled it. This I did to clean the machine and I find that no part of the machine shows the least amount of wear and this in the face of running the machine thirteen hours a day, six days a week.

"I consider this a most remarkable performance.

"The reason I write you this letter is because I am so pleased with the work of the machine, which has never caused one moment of trouble.

"Yours truly,
"(Signed) EDWIN HEALY,

A City Chap's Adventure in the Country

The Moth

in this story was not associated with the proverbial Flame — just Smoke. And where there was smoke there WASN'T fire—also in contradiction of a proverbial phrase. The picture deals with the folly of jumping at hasty conclusions, especially if you're a city chap in the country and keen to "show" the yokels. Our hero was such, and he got long, lingering laughs for his pains. Book the reel and join in the laugh!

No. 241. Code Word, Moth.

Scene from Romeo and Juliet

Released Friday, Sept. 1

PART ONE

Romeo and Juliet

By William Shakespeare

Each part is so constructed that it tells a complete story on its own account. Giving a half-hour's show as the two parts do when used together, they will enable exhibitors to give a "Romeo and Juliet Night" that affords all manners of opportunity for feature advertising. Many managers will use them as they appear, for the first showing, and book them together for the return date. As the depiction of "the greatest love story of all," and a classic of the highest type, the subject is one that you can make your theater remembered by.

BESS OF THE FOREST

A thrilling drama and intensely human. About a little girl who, lost while touring the West with her parents, is found by a Mexican, who takes her home to his wife. She grows to beautiful womanhood and Garcia's wife becomes jealous of her. At this point she is recognized by a young surveyor, who, with the assistance of a party of cowboys, rescues her. And they marry.

Scene from "ARCHIBALD THE HERO"

Scene from "FOUNTAIN OF YOUTH"

Released Saturday, August 26th Length about 1000 feet

ARCHIBALD THE HERO

The story of a vacuous youth who is sent West by his parents in an effort to make a man of him. He becomes a hero for a day and wins the love of a beautiful girl. Though he later becomes the laughing stock of the community, she still loves him and sticks by him. It's a scream.

Released Monday August 28th Split Reel

The Secret

Jack Stanhope, newly married, smells cigarette smoke. He is insanely jealous. Yes, he will kill the man who stole his wife's affections! But he is disillusioned when he sees her take a cigarette from her maid's coiffure and light it. Length about 600 feet.

Fountain of Youth

How his Satanic Majesty cured Mr. Grouch. A side-splitting comedy, in which the irascible old man becomes a child again and wakes up to find it was only a dream. He is cured of his rantankerousness. Length about 400 feet.

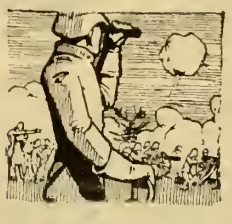
LIFE PORTRAYALS



"WAGES OF WAR"
Monday, August 21

A Southern episode of the Civil War. Heroism of a beautiful Southern girl to save her brother from death. Full of military action and engaging sentiment.

"HOW BETTY WON THE SCHOOL" Tuesday, August 22

A Wild West girl captures the school when she captures a burglar with her lariat. Betty is just as pretty as she is dashing and full of fun. Just like the picture.

"The Sheriff's Friend"
Wednesday, August 23

This is a Western Ethic. Faithful to his official obligations, the Sheriff performs his duty first and then considers friendship. A rugged picture of life on the border among the cowboys and the wild life of the ranges.

"MY OLD DUTCH" Friday, August 25

Suggested by Albert Chevalier's well-known song, "My Old Dutch." A Costermonger story. "It's English, you know," in setting, but widespread in sentiment. It's like in beauty and novelty has never been seen.

"A HANDSOMER MAN"
Saturday, August 26

A Monanthroplay—because it is a whole play performed by one man. A man jealous of his wife fumes and raves without any cause, then laughs at himself. Everybody laughs at him and with him.

But "Castles in the Air"

a Rex wonder-film, released Thursday, Aug. 24th, will bring your box-receipts UP and your hand DOWN, down over your heart, swearing allegiance to REX. It's a dream of a picture, showing the blissful dream of Bedelia, a maid, who suddenly becomes transformed to mistress of the house, goes automobiling, yachting, and is courted by a lord—Lord, what a dream! Castles in the air! Who doesn't build them? Who at one time or other isn't the architect of some fairy, airy castle among the clouds? But ah! the awakening!

Bedelia wakes up; your audience wakes up—they'll think they were dreaming themselves; and you wake up to the fact that

REX IS THERE!

TESTIMONIALS

ORPHEUM THEATER

Chicago, Ill., Oct. 10, 1910.

Mr. A. W. Wylie, President,
Sunlight Metallic Cloth Curtain Co.,
1100 Fisher Building, Chicago.

Dear Sir:

The Sunlight Metallic Cloth Picture Screen that we purchased of you and installed at our Orpheum Theater, 176 State St., Chicago, has proved satisfactory in every way, and we have decided to purchase and install your screen in all of our other houses where we now have inferior curtains. Will be pleased to have you forward your usual contracts covering the list of theaters enclosed.

Your curtain has stood the test of four months' daily use at our Orpheum Theater, and we consider it has demonstrated conclusively to us every merit that you claimed for it, and it has not only improved our picture 50 per cent., but brings out the detail of the picture to an extraordinary degree. Gives it a bright, soft effect, not tiring to the eye, and is particularly fine for our tinted films, as it reproduces the colors perfectly and intensifies them.

We have found that it was necessary to use but from 30 to 35 amperes of electricity on our machines, and has therefore reduced our cost of operation relatively, as we formerly used from 45 to 50 amperes on our old screen. Yours truly,

JONES, LINICK & SCHAEFER CO.,
Sam'l I. Levin, Gen. Mgr.

ELECTRIC THEATER

Chicago, June 26th, 1911.

"Sunlight" Metallic Cloth Curtain Company,
1100 Fisher Building, Chicago.

Gentlemen:

When your man installed the "Sunlight" curtain some two weeks ago he requested that at my convenience I would let you know the results obtained; whether satisfactory or unsatisfactory.

I wish to say that while I considered I was showing one of the best pictures in town upon the screen I had in use, I know that the picture which I get upon the screen you sold me is far superior in every way.

The picture is soft but very clear-cut and shows the distance or perspective in a remarkable degree. I believe that without question I am showing the best picture in Chicago.

I pay a high price for my film service, but never received the full benefit before, although my projection is and has always been without fault.

I am glad to make the above statement, as having had a remarkably good curtain before, I was in doubt as to whether any appreciable improvement would be shown by installing your curtain.

Yours very truly,
GEORGE FRIEDMAN.

MAJESTIC THEATER

Butte, Montana, April 25, 1911.

The Sunlight Metallic Cloth Curtain Co.,
1100 Fisher Building, Chicago.

Gentlemen:

Enclosed find check for $140.50, covering charges on one 11 ft. by 14 ft. "Sunlight" fixed screen and one "Standard" frame with fittings.

I wish to compliment you on the excellency of the picture thrown on this screen, as it surpasses anything I have seen so far in the curtain line, both in brilliancy and absence of eye-strain. The feature which particularly appeals to me is, that while the pictures on the screen are decidedly brilliant, the strain and tiring of the eyes so prevalent in brilliant curtains is practically absent from this one. Very truly yours,

W. J. SWARTS.

CASINO THEATER

Chas. Weegham.
103 E. Madison St.,
Chicago, February 24, 1911.

Sunlight Metallic Cloth Curtain Co.,
1101 Fisher Building, Chicago.

Gentlemen:

We enclose you herewith our check for $193.00, payment in full for your invoice for Sunlight Metallic Cloth Curtain, less 5 per cent. cash discount.

We secure a truly wonderful improvement in our picture. Can keep our house well lighted without apparently affecting it, and this is very pleasing to our patrons.

The picture that we get on your curtain is soft in general effect, very clear in detail, and our patrons offer no objection to taking out front rows of seats.

Before we bought your curtain we had purchased the best and highest priced machines and paid for first run of films, but got only half the value of them because we did not have the proper screen. We think now, for the first time, we are getting the picture that is on the film. Yours very truly,

CASINO THEATER,
Per J. E. Horn, Mgr.

GEM THEATER

Union City, Tennessee.

Sunlight Metallic Cloth Curtain Co.,
Chicago, Ill.

Gentlemen:

I have the curtain installed, and it is the finest curtain I have ever seen. I get a fine white light and can do so with less current than I have been using. I have had to use 60 amperes alternating current, and now, almost all the time, unless the picture is very dark, I can get the best results at 30 amperes.

We got it up in good shape, and there is not a wrinkle in it. I cannot recommend it too highly.

Thanking you for favors, and with best wishes,
Yours truly,
W. C. MORRIS.

ORION THEATER

Butte, Montana, April 25, 1911.

Mr. E. SACHS,
Rep. Sunlight Metallic Cloth Curtain Co.,
Butte, Montana.

Dear Mr. Sachs:

I wish to notify you of my acceptance of the new Sunlight Metallic Screen which you installed at the Orion Theater. The pictures thrown on this screen are the most satisfactory of any I have seen, and there is no reflected glare or eye-strain.

I have endeavored for some time to secure a screen of the highest brilliancy without the accompanying eye-strain, and have found these qualities only in the Sunlight Metallic Screen.

Yours very truly,
SULLIVAN & CONSIDINE.

Facts and Comments

SOME manufacturers are reverting to the "tank drama" in its palmiest day. The "tank drama," an illegitimate but sturdy sister of the old-fashioned melodrama, was a species of circus on the stage. The hero needed no histrionic experience or talents, but had to be a good swimmer. About the end of the third act he dove into a tank of "real water," as the press agent put it, and rescued the heroine, who had to be something of a swimmer herself to keep from drowning until the arrival of "handsome Jack." Eventually the appellation "tank drama" was extended to include any thrilling display of realism. Animals, such as dogs and horses, frequently shared in the glory of the rescue.

The "tank drama," dear to the small boy and his larger sister, has followed the melodrama into the limbo of the "gone and forgotten." It should not be revived through the medium of the silent stage; or if revived, should be properly labeled as such. Let the titles be candid and announce "a phenomenal dive of 100 feet," or "a wonderful jump," or "a most realistic fire." The plot, written around the cleverness of some trained animal or around a "dive" or a "jump," may go once or twice, but gets tiresome after that. Realism, as an integral part growing directly and naturally out of the plot, is much to be commended. The silent stage has a great advantage in being able to tell a story with natural settings. Realism for the sake of realism and the subordination of the plot to some feat of realism, is to be rejected and can safely be left to out-door vaudeville.

Such attempted revival of the tank drama in moving pictures again calls attention to the present distressing barrenness in plot and incident and to the deadly monotony which, if kept up, will be a sure means of depreciating the moving picture and driving away or estranging its friends. The film maker is not like the playwright for the "legitimate" stage confined to a few square feet of boards, but has the entire world at his disposal, and the world is full of variety, if one has eyes to see. The complaint of exhibitors regarding the constant repetition of the same or similar themes by different companies within a few months at the most has good foundation.

IT argues well for the progress of the moving picture when the prominent literary lights and the moral leaders of a large American city are invited to witness a private exhibition. Such was the case last Friday in Baltimore. The film was the Milano production of Dante's "Inferno." Over a hundred invitations had been issued, and notwithstanding the diabolical heat, almost every one accepted and was present. Some of the most influential clergymen were among the spectators. After the exhibition the moving picture, as an eloquent revelation of its own possibilities, had gained as many friends as there were spectators. Reckless agitation against the moving picture will never be tried again in Baltimore without the rising up of its new and powerful friends. Such exhibitions help the moving picture to strike its roots deeper than ever into the best soil of our civilization.

MANY years ago THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD insisted, among other things, on the driving of cheap vaudeville out of moving picture theaters and on a "divorce of the picture from the nickel." The recent National Convention of Exhibitors at Cleveland contended in its platform for the same changes. It is pleasant and consoling to contemplate the progress made toward obtaining these reforms. Cheap vaudeville as an adjunct of moving pictures has all but disappeared from the horizon. In the matter of higher prices, progress is slower. In New York, notorious for its gross ignorance of projection, etc., the exhibitor is getting ten cents without trouble, ten cents being really the minimum of admission, while in the nearby cities of Philadelphia and Baltimore the nickel remains altogether too prominent. A little intelligent agitation and co-operation would bring about the desired results in short order.

PRESENT day solicitude for the child, especially touching on and appertaining to the influence of motion pictures is, in the light of child-life of other days, quite amusing. Why is it that the present day child should be affected injuriously by the bloodshed depicted in the Indian picture when the child of other days fairly reveled in the gory tales from the Arabian Nights or was sent shivering to bed after the narration of the adventures of "Hop O' My Thumb" and "Jack the Giant Killer?" Is it that the child of today is cast in a finer mold and therefore more sensible to shock? Or is that the champions of children's rights and wrong have lost the true sense of proportion; have forgotten the days of their youth?

Another phase of the child question comes frequently to the front in the plea of the youthful offender who pleads "that he saw it in the pictures" in extenuation of his wrongdoing. The comment of a Municipal Court Judge of a town in Maine, himself a scenario writer, when cautioned upon this peculiar angle of picture criticism, is interesting: "The Board of Censors should not lay awake nights worrying about the kids," he writes. "The kind we deal with can teach the scenario writers more deviltry than they ever dreamed of." From this we take it that the "kid" is misunderstood by many reformers; that he is composed of sturdy stuff—a real red blooded human being after all, and not the milk and water creation that many of his self appointed protectors would have us believe.

It should not be taken from these few remarks that the MOVING PICTURE WORLD has joined the reactionaries. Our opinion is merely that the hue and cry against the motion picture as a corruptor of the child proceeds from exaggerated notions of the corruptibility of the child and lack of appreciation of its powers of discrimination.

From a recent issue of the Daily Consular and Trade Reports, a government circular, we learn that the province of Ontario has passed a law regulating the moving picture business in that section. It provides that all films exhibited in Ontario must be passed upon by the National Board of Censorship.

The Earmark on the Film.

By Epes Winthrop Sargent.

NOTHING more to the point has been said about the sameness of photoplays than was printed in a recent issue of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD in a letter from an old exhibitor to the new manufacturer, in which he alluded to the marks by which certain of the directors leave their imprints upon most of the stories produced by them. But little more was said than to give a hint, but the subject might have been extended almost to the number of directors in the business.

The matter was treated lightly, but it is pregnant with suggestion and the earmark of the director is the real answer to the questions as to the sameness of the films.

A magazine represents the work of perhaps a score of authors. Most editors, certainly all successful ones, seek to retain as much of the individuality of the writer as is possible. The stories may have been selected because they conformed to certain editorial requirements; indeed, a magazine without an established editorial policy could not last long, but so long as the stories meet the broad requirements of that policy they are let alone and the necessary editing is done with a view to retaining as much of the personality of the author as possible.

In the studio the reverse is the case. A story may be edited with due care and be turned over to the director with the individuality of the author, but the director will have none of it. He protests that the story will never do, that he must fix it up—and he does, precisely as he has "fixed up" every story he has made in the past six months.

The original idea in advertising for scenarios from outside authors was to get away from the sameness of the pictures the studio director was making. It was planned that the story writers and other outsiders should give variety to the product, but this end is not gained if the stories in their final development still represent the producer rather than the author.

The trouble appears to be that in most studios there is no one to direct the director. He is regarded with undue respect by his employers, and they defer to him in most things. The attitude is a relic of the days when the photoplay was yet young and when a director who could direct meant something more than mere profit. More than one company has been given its first uplift by a director who could make good pictures, and even when the field broadened until there were plenty of able directors, the superstition that it was bad luck to cross a director still obtained and still does obtain in many studios. The director is not human who will not avail himself of this position to do precisely as he thinks best, even though his ideas of best are the exploitation of his personal beliefs as opposed to dramatic rule, common sense and the change in the fashion of films.

Hundreds of plays are spoiled each year because directors are permitted without restraint to make a picture precisely as they please, owing to the belief that a director must not be interfered with. Any original bit in a script that does not harmonize with the producer's own ideas of originality is rewritten to conform to the hard and fast rule, and then the cry is raised that there is no use getting outside scripts because there is no orginality among authors. There never will be so long as there is a double check against originality in the form of an editor and a producer each of whom is determined that things shall be done thus and so. The producer has the last word and his personality is the more strongly dominant, but the script often comes to the director already half spoiled because the editor himself has some pet theories.

Those familiar with the conditions in any studio can tell almost invariably which director made a certain story simply through the earmarks on the film. The ingenious bit on which the author spent a couple of hours may be done to death in ten lines—and upon the flattened wreck is raised another of the same old stories with all the earmarks of the producer, and the manufacturer wonders why his stuff seems so same, but doesn't dare ask the producer lest he be offended.

Audiences are less thoughtful of the absent producer's feelings, and now and then when two photoplays from the same production get on the same program the marked similarity brings forth comment that is far from appreciative. The successful, the continuously successful, photoplay maker is the man who will insist that every member of his staff devote his endeavor to preserving the originality of the writer, whose editor merely edits for technical faults, whose director directs the script given him, and whose players do not know more than the author, editor and director combined. Such things may come to pass some day. May that day be soon.

A Wise Rejection.

IT has been learned that at the late national convention of exhibitors in Cleveland a resolution was moved which in substance recommended that a committee be appointed to consider the possibility of establishing and maintaining a chain of exchanges throughout the United States on a coöperative basis, such exchanges to handle both licensed and independent films and to be controlled by exhibitors. The resolution was not carried.

The good sense and wisdom of the convention was shown by voting such a resolution down. The three great departments of the moving picture industry—the manufacturing, the distributing and the exhibiting—are well defined and are the result of the natural development of the business. It has been shown that the closer the manufacturer keeps to his manufacturing, and the exchange man to his distributing, the better it has been for the exhibitor and the picture business. When the manufacturer dabbles in exchanges and the exchange men in picture theaters, it is decidedly bad for the exhibitor and the business in general. For exhibitors to engage in the distribution of films, even if such a thing were possible, could scarcely fail to result in dissension among themselves, as in competition for business every man is prone to consider himself first and his neighbor's case afterward.

If the rights as to the overstepping of natural bounds are fairly considered, the film manufacturer has greater right than either the exhibitor or the exchange to go outside of his bounds. His enterprise has made possible both the exchange and the exhibitor. Had he deemed it best, he might have established exchanges and erected theaters to bring his product before the people, but he has confined himself chiefly to the manufacturing field, knowing that it requires all his resources and energy. At the same time he has regulated the exchange for the benefit of the exhibitor.

A fair and dispassionate comparison of the three great departments along the line of efficiency, will reveal that the exhibiting has not kept pace with the distributing and manufacturing departments. Although in a measure retarded by the adverse building ordinances of various cities, the average picture theater falls below the standard that might have been reached at this time. The average intelligence of exhibitors has been lowered by the influx to the business of men of varied occupations, who had the necessary means to open a store theater, but who lacked all the requisites of successful showmen. It has required considerable experience to teach such men the value of well selected programs, of good projection, the right kind of advertising, etc. Many of these undesirables have dropped out of the business and their places are being taken by live, intelligent men of larger means, who are erecting a better type of picture theater.

The exhibiting department is, therefore, progressing rapidly and it will require all the managerial and business talents, as well as foresight, of exhibitors to meet new problems in exhibition, as they are presented, without trespassing on the domain of the exchange.

What is needed is a proper understanding between the exhibitor and the exchange, not a merging of the two departments. That "proper understanding" exists in other lines of business, as between merchant and customer. The customer's trade is sought after and the best efforts of the merchant are put forth to retain it, once it has been secured.

The Open Market—Pros and Cons.

By W. Stephen Bush.

HOWEVER we may differ as to the advantages or disadvantages of an open market, there can be no doubt that its effects would be immediate and revolutionary in character. An open market would in an instant transfer the power, now lodged in the grasp of the manufacturer, into the hands of the exhibitor. The relations of licensor and licensee would at once be changed into the positions of buyer and seller. The industry would be dominated by the exhibitor. He would dictate the policy of the manufacturers. The responsibility for the well being and progress of the moving picture art would devolve entirely on the exhibitor.

Is the exhibitor at this time capable of assuming these heavy responsibilities? Is it certain that he will discharge his new functions to the best advantage of the moving picture?

It cannot be expected that the exhibitor is infallible. The question is not whether the exhibitor is perfect, but whether control of the industry by the exhibitor is to be preferred to the present domination of the manufacturers.

Let us say at the outset that the present control of the situation by the film makers is in more respects than one an unsatisfactory condition. The experience of mankind in all ages has shown beyond the peradventure of a doubt that it is unsafe to put arbitrary and absolute power in the hands of any man or set of men. Human nature is so constituted that an abuse of such power is as near a moral certainty as anything can be in this life. Possession of absolute power brings with it as inevitable concomitants pride and arrogance. The greatest men in history have had their usefulness changed into destructiveness through abuse of dictatorial power, and though no one will claim the presence of any great men in the circles we allude to, it must be remembered that the rule applies even more forcibly to little men. The compulsory purchase of film laughs at the law of demand and supply and sets at defiance the axiom of the survival of the fittest. The rule now is: "Whatever is made, is fit." The exhibitor's feeble protest is drowned in the thunderous command: "Thou shalt buy." As a rule, he buys. The remedy offered by another set of film makers is too often found illusory.

The worst feature of the present situation remains to be stated. It is overproduction. The exhibitor is constantly confronted with announcements of new releases. "Owing to an irresistible public demand, the Supreme Film Company will hereafter release an additional reel every week." Whether the "irresistible public demand" is the unsupported opinion of the film maker or an actual fact, makes no difference whatever. Overproduction is the deadly foe of quality, the only thing that can count in an industry so much akin to art. How many manufacturers have the right to say to-day: "We make more and better pictures"? As a rule, more pictures mean poorer pictures. Time is the most essential factor in the production of quality. It is a fact that the companies which have in the past made and are still making the best pictures are very slow about increasing the quantity of their output. Great experience and skill, a fine plant, competent actors, gifted producers, are of course necessary to a good picture, but even more necessary than all these is a sufficiency of time.

Right at this moment several makers of film are falling into a hopeless rut. Ideas and plots vary hardly an inch from one reel to another. Some are going back to subjects and methods and mannerisms that might have been excusable five years ago, but to-day cannot be regarded other than evidences of moving picture atavism. In some measure the forced and artificial conditions of the market are responsible for all of this deplorable situation.

Would the open market be a sovereign remedy for all these unhealthy conditions? Would overproduction cease and quality come into its own? Can the laws of supply and demand and of the survival of the fittest be trusted to work out the salvation of the moving picture industry?

These are questions to which only the inconsiderate or careless have ready answers. There was an open market just after the birth of the industry, but it was strangled too soon to let us know what the developments would have been. The open market would be largely an experiment.

As things stand to-day the responsibility for conditions can be squarely put upon the film makers. While theoretically they are to-day accountable to no one, practically they are very much accountable to public opinion. Even the most hardened self-conceit cannot very long resist the demands and protests of the public. The years have brought with them a code of moving picture ethics from which film makers now depart but on very rare occasions. To some extent, at least, the demand for clean pictures has been heeded.

If the power over the picture were transferred to the exhibitor, division of responsibility, with its attendant train of evils, would be likely to follow. Even a very small number of exhibitors could cause a revival of objectionable pictures and thereby immeasurably damage the industry as a whole, for, as we of the moving picture know only too well, the public are slow to give credit, but quick to deal out blame. No bad picture was ever shown that did not throw its waves of influence into every corner of the industry. It may be urged that we are pleading for utopian conditions and that bad pictures can never be wholly done away with. Very true, but bad pictures can be kept down by intelligent and conscientious effort, while a withdrawing of the check would make them grow like vermin.

As a rule, every abuse carries its own remedy. If the makers, who now control the great bulk of the market, deteriorate they cannot endure long. Skill, intelligence and capital cannot be monopolized forever. The industry to-day is attracting the greatest artistic talents. With the growing field and the wider and better popularity, capital will turn to the moving picture, and nothing more is needed than a union of capital and talent.

In the meantime many people are wondering why the manufacturers, whose products in an open market would outsell all others, do not become leaders in a movement for emancipation and an open market.

Echo answers. Why?

Reviews of Notable Films

SWORDS AND HEARTS.—(Biograph.)

ONE of the scenario problems of the day is to write a Civil War story that will not offend that considerable population south of Mason and Dixon's line. There may exist some small question in Swords and Hearts, but that remains to be definitely determined by the real judges. It is a question of whether Southern people will relish the idea of one of their daughters jilting an unfortunate Confederate soldier for a victorious Union officer of means. Southerners may swallow the situation without making a face, on the broad grounds of human nature, but there is another pill to be swallowed when the ruined returning Confederate officer decides to marry a "Cracker" girl, or poor white. A poor white is hardly any more popular in the South than the northern war-time soldier. These two elements are the only ones that can be suggested as possible faults in Swords and Hearts.

Aside from these speculative flaws, which may or may not amount to much, Swords and Hearts is an excellent production. It is acted in the usual Biograph way and is full of the gentle pathos peculiar to the Confederate point of view. The picture as a whole is partial to the Southern side. It has more to do with events at home while the able-bodied men are away at war than it has to do with battlefields. As a matter of fact, there are no battle scenes. Neither is there any triumphal parading of the Union flag nor any trailing of the stars and bars. It is a domestic drama resulting directly from a conflict raging elsewhere.

There are in this picture some familiar Southern types that are depicted with skill. The old faithful colored manservant is one of these; also the dignified type of elderly Southern aristocratic planter, so ably portrayed in this instance by the late Verner Clarges (see death notice elsewhere in this issue), one of the last appearances of that venerable and widely known classic actor.

The portico of the Southern mansion is a piece of artistic realism that gives the picture the true atmosphere of antebellum gentility. It is a substantially built structure that is later destroyed by a band of marauding ruffians known as bushwhackers, who, after looting the mansion, set fire to it and burn it to the ground.

The story centers around the son of a Southern planter and two women. One of them a cold, haughty and calculating young woman of aristocratic birth; the other a "cracker" girl, daughter of a mountain berry-picker. At the outbreak of the Civil War, Hugh Frazier, son of the planter, is engaged to Irene Lambert, the proud beauty, who values him only for his social standing and prospective inheritance. From a distance Jennie Baker, the berry-picker's daughter, has learned to love the dashing young soldier, who was never too proud to notice her when sometimes she came to his home to sell berries. On the day that he left for the war, young Frazier, in his impulsive, debonaire way, leaned over in his saddle and stole a kiss from Jennie Baker. He forgot the kiss in the next few minutes, but the sweetness of his compliment lingered forever on her lips.

Hugh Frazier returning home after the war. Scene from "Swords and Hearts." Biograph release for Aug. 28.

Once during the war Hugh Frazier stole home, to visit his sweetheart, Irene. On this occasion the berry-girl was the means of saving him from capture by using his horse and overcoat as a decoy. She seemed to come as a good angel sent to watch over a brave heart; for by this time things had changed and his old home lay within the Union lines. He escaped this danger, thinking, perhaps, that Irene had been his guardian angel. That night the bushwhackers, led by Jennie Baker's rough father, attacked and burned the home of the man she loved. The faithful old negro servant, divining such an attack, had buried the family treasure and the marauders evidently burned the house out of disappointment. The attack and retreat of the bushwhackers, together with the burning of the mansion, is one of the most thrilling and realistic scenes ever seen in moving pictures.

Realistic fire scene—Burning of the Frazier mansion. From "Hearts and Swords."

In the fire and fracas Jennie and Hugh each lost their father. Jennie lived alone thereafter in her father's shack until Hugh came back. He made his way in tattered garments to the home of Irene, expecting to be received with gladness. Instead of that, his supposed guardian angel proved to be but a fickle goddess, whose heart had turned to stone. From her he learned that he was a pauper; that home and father were gone forever. Moreover, he found her engaged to a sardonic and prosperous Union officer, and both seemed to regard it as a good joke on Hugh Frazier.

Bruised in body and soul, he shuffled listlessly toward his old home, there to find it a bleak ruin. But there also he found the faithful Jennie, who had waited there day after day for his return. There also he found the faithful negro man-servant. From him he learned how the girl had saved his life, and then the faithful black led them to the buried treasure. The darkest hour of our lives is the hour in which to know our real friends from the fair weather kind. What wonder then that Hugh Frazier should turn to these two lowly creatures and grapple them to his heart with hooks of steel?

THE MISSION WAIF (Melies).

THE excellent settings of this film, all of them with but two or three exceptions taken from nature directly, entitle it to rank as a notable production. It represents a creditable and ambitious effort to bring to mind the days of old California, a subject always welcome to American audiences and always full of the air of romance. A little girl, the sole survivor of an Indian attack, made upon some settlers traveling across the plains, is found and adopted by a band of Mission Fathers. Under the fostering care of the fathers the girl grows to early womanhood, but, no doubt, by virtue of some special dispensation is left to be the helper and companion of the priests, who not only minister to the spiritual wants of the Indians and settlers, but till the soil and do all their own work. Into all this peace and serenity comes a wounded bandit, closely pursued by settlers. The fugitive claims refuge in the convent and obtains it. His arrival at the gate and the scene in the stillness of the cloister's vestibule, where the young ward of the fathers listens in enraptured silence to the priest's sweet playing of the violin, are decidedly effective and will appeal to every audience. The further story shows how the robber's identity is disclosed by a scar, how the girl, though in love with the man, turns from him, when she finds out who he is and how the robber leaves the sheltering walls of the convent. On his way to his next destination, the robber uncovers an ambush of Indians and hastens back to the convent to give notice of the approach of the hostile red men. The priests and the girl take refuge in an underground passage. While the robber is bravely defending the convent against the Indian attack, the girl has succeeded in escaping the vigilance of the Indians and getting word of the danger to a nearby settlement. The settlers hasten to the rescue and the girl finds her unfortunate lover dead.

FROM OESTERSUND TO STORLIEN (Great Northern).

The solemn, almost gloomy and at times mystic character of the Northland scenery has been most happily shown in this film, which has a specific educational value. The pictures have been taken in such a manner, that the spectator witnessing them on the screen, can without much mental effort put himself on board the train, which runs through most of the scenes and imagine he sees the things from the windows of his car. While the film as a whole possesses sufficient merit to place it in the category of notable productions there are two points that seem to deserve special mention. The portrayal of the northern lights is one. The latter part of the film is splendidly done and gives a touch of vivifying light to an otherwise perhaps too sombre landscape. The other point has reference to the water scenes, which are quite imposing. The mountain sides covered with innumerable glistening stalactites and all manner of weird and fantastic shapes of ice make a spectacle that well deserved recording in films.

"A LITTLE CHILD" (Reliance).

THERE is much human truth pictured by this release of the Reliance Company, and it is deep and significant. It's a picture that, true as it is, could easily be misinterpreted if it had not been well acted. Mr. Walthall very skillfully plays the burglar, outcast and lonely, who is awakened from his sleep under a tree by a child. She, with a bag of cookies, has run away from her gossiping nurse. The child makes friends with him as children will with such as have still in their hearts something child-like, something human. A child who would run from a respected millionaire might be very quick to make friends with a burglar. And this child is soon fast friends with this burglar. They talk together till the silly nurse finds them.

Not long after, the burglar happens to enter the house of the child's parents. The noise of his entrance wakes the child, who fearlessly goes down stairs in her long white night dress and enters the room where the burglar has just wrapped up a rich haul of the family silver. He takes her up and while he talks to her she falls asleep in his arms, a very natural thing, and his heart prompts him to carry her up to her bed. He knows where the nursery is, he had entered that way by means of a ladder against the roof of the porch. He lays the child down. The better feelings in his heart have mastered his greed and instead of going back for the silver, he goes out by the window and disappears. This is a very commendable ending. It doesn't demand too much of the spectators and is convincing.

The child's part is acted very naturally by Baby Rosanna, and this, with Henry Walthall's presentation of the humane burglar, make the picture powerful. Baby Rosanna is a very little tot indeed, not much bigger than the doll she plays with. She is a very winsome little lass, and though in this picture she is playing the part of a child half her age, this reviewer failed to notice any slip, any of an older girl's mannerisms, in her portrayal. This is more remarkable as she appears in scenes, playing nearly the whole gamut of a child's day. Her eating the porridge at the breakfast table shows wide-awake observation. It is a picture of a child just old enough to revolt against having its mother hold the spoon, yet isn't able to manipulate it well yet. The child's mother (Jane Fernley plays the part) fills a part that requires no great resources, but pictures the character very acceptably, as does the father (James Cooley). Mr. Walthall's work in this picture is noteworthy. He, as of course is well known, has already won a wide reputation as a strong player in emotional parts. This character demanded of him more self-criticism than imagination. It is in marked contrast to his impersonation of the man waiting at the railway station in "Waiting." That portrayal might be compared to a long throw and this to a very nice one. It would have been very easy to overthrow the mark in picturing this burglar. Perhaps the part is a trifle overdrawn at the moment when the child awakens from sleep, but the player makes up for this by walking the narrow edge of perfection through the library scene and the one in the child's nursery that follows it.

The Reliance camera man should also be commended for good workmanship in taking many of these scenes. In the scene where the burglar appears, climbing the ladder to the roof (a scene which was particularly well laid out, by the way), there is little suggestion of daylight—it is moon light that we see. Taken as a whole (purpose, conduct, acting, stage setting and photography) the picture is one well worth while.

Technique of the Photoplay

CHAPTER VI.

Emphasis, Visions and Trick Effects.

In the spoken drama the player has the advantage of verbal emphasis to call attention to the important parts of his speech. On the printed page italic or capital letters invite particular attention to certain important words and passages. In the drama of action the picture player must convey his emphasis by making prominent the vital action. This should be done not by violent ranting, but by pointing up the action; by dwelling upon it, until the spectator assimilates the point.

Should the story concern the adventures of a man who has left home without any money in his pockets, it is essential that the fact that he is without funds be given due emphasis. In actual life a man would feel in the pocket where he keeps his bill-fold and in that other pocket where his small change is kept. He might make a quick investigation of the other pockets, but the entire action would be commonplace and unenlightening. It requires but a moment to assure himself of his impecuniosity, but that is not sufficient in the photoplay.

It might be possible to convey the fact in a leader which explains that "Smith finds he has no money," but the printed leader will not make the same impression as is to be obtained from pictured action.

Suppose that Smith is lunching. The meal is finished and the check is presented. Smith makes the addition and feels in his pocket for his money. The bill-fold is not there and he looks to see if his small change will be sufficient. To his dismay he finds that pocket empty. Now the matter takes on a serious aspect. He examines his other pockets, he removes the contents of some in the vain hope that some vagrant bill may be found. The waiter, who has stood in smiling expectation of a tip, now grows suspicious. He does not answer with a grin Smith's effort to make his predicament a joke. He calls the proprietor to aid him in dealing with the supposed deadbeat, and Smith exits from the scene with the fact definitely established that he is dead broke. The following scenes are fully intelligible to all.

Action More Effective Than Leader.

Had the leader been used the same fact would have been told, but it would not have made the same impression. In any circumstance leader should be regarded as a last resort and not as a convenient way of getting around difficulties.

To take another example let us suppose that at a dance a girl is claimed by two men for the same waltz. It is desired to establish the fact that the girl cares for one more than for the other. The latter has the right to the dance, but she regrets the termination of her tete-a-tete with the first. She leaves him with a lingering glance of regret that at once establishes the status of all three.

Played at normal speed the significance of the glance would be lost, but if the girl hesitates for a moment, half turns back to the man she cares for and yields only to the pressure of the second man, the deliberate action points up the situation, makes it apparent that she prefers the man who is left behind.

If he should turn and leave the scene unconcernedly there would be no advancement of the plot, but should he watch them as they pass to the dancing floor and give evidence of his regret, it is made plain that he is in love with the girl and does not merely seek to make himself agreeable in the fulfilment of his social duty.

Do Not Depend Upon the Producer.

It may reasonably be argued that it is the duty of the director to point up the action, and that fact is admitted but it is also the duty of the photo-playwright to give the director all the aid in his power. As has been shown, each scene is played independently of all the others and all the facts of one scene should be related in that scene, instead of leaving it to the director to carry over from some other scene the implied action of the scene upon which he is engaged.

It may be that a scene is written in which the author seeks to convey the impression that an accidental collision is really the effort of a pickpocket. If the scene is written "a man collides with John" it may be regarded as a bit of by-play, but if John is made to pause and look after the other with a scowl the fact of the happening is impressed and, when the fact of theft is established later on, the spectator immediately reverts to the previous scene without hesitation.

Emphasis by Contrast.

Sometimes emphasis is conveyed by contrasting scenes. We see the bountiful board of the employer and the next instant some employee making a single small loaf suffice for his entire family. Later on when the employee attempts to right his supposed wrongs his process of thought is more sympathetically followed than if a leader explained that "Paul seeks to avenge his wrongs."

Contrasting scenes may be used in pairs or in series. The use of a series of contrasts is a device that appeals strongly to some directors and the use of such scenes is decidedly effective if the device is not used too often.

The series scene may also be used to cover the commission of crime or the passage of time. A terrific fight between burglars and householder might not meet with the approval of the Censor Board where no objection would be made were the fight broken by contrasting scenes showing the police hurrying to the aid of the victim. The suspense is heightened and with proper handling the audience can be worked up to a vivid interest in the outcome.

Alternating flashes between pursuer and pursued, contrasting scenes between an attacking party and the defenders and similar effects are best worked in series but each scene should carry the story ahead and move it perceptibly toward the final development.

Visions and Double Exposures.

Visions and other forms of double exposures should be sparingly used, though the employment of this trick device is decidedly effective when rightly handled. They should not be dragged in bodily, because the double exposure is apt to be troublesome and the Editor is not hunting trouble for his camera men, but few Editors will pass a story that is effective merely because it demands a little extra work.

Visions are effective in explaining motives, and evading leaders. When the erring wife confronts her wronged husband and he is seen to take her back, the vision of a dead child will explain his reasons at the exact moment. Should the scene be prefaced by a leader which explains that "John takes Edna back for the sake of their dead daughter," the element of suspense is removed because the audience knows before hand that the wife will be restored to her place.

In the same manner the convict in his cell may see visions of his home or the repetition of his crime, the bachelor may recall a lost love or the desperado be turned from crime by some memory of the past. The writing in of visions is not to be encouraged but there are times when their use is demanded.

At times it is well to offer both leader and vision and let the Editor exercise his judgment. The scene of the erring wife might be written with leader and without the vision and at the end of that scene a note might suggest that "The leader might be effectively replaced by a vision of the little girl."

Other double exposures are apt to be concerned only with studio practice. They are obtained by running the film through the camera a second time, superimposing an exposure or exposing a part of the film only on each passage through the camera.

Trick Effects.

With the trick picture proper the photo-playwright has nothing to do. These are planned in the studio to meet the possibilities of the equipment. The outside writer has no knowledge of these possibilities and stands small chance of making a sale. At best the trick picture can only be offered in synopsis form.

In addition to the double exposure the principal methods of tricking pictures are variations in the timing of the film, stopping the camera and the elision of certain frames from the finished film.

In the latter method the film is made but some of the frames are removed, the others being joined up, so that the actions of the players becomes eccentric. With the stop camera the exposure may be stopped to introduce or remove some person or object from the scene or the camera may stop after each exposure to alter the position of inanimate objects, as the doll dramas and animated furniture. With the stop camera a scene may require as many days, or even weeks, as it runs minutes. In the timing method advantage is taken of the fact that pictures are shown fifteen or sixteen frames to the second. If the camera is turned more rapidly or more slowly the speed of the actors is changed. Slow turning makes rapid action and fast turning slow the action.

Pictures in which the action is reversed are made by reversing either the film or the camera according to the make of the instrument. This device is useful in legitimate pictures in showing a person leaping to a high wall or some similar effect. With the film reversed the player jumps off backward and when the scene is righted the reverse effect is gained.

Practically any effect may be gained by tricking but the author should not count too confidently upon the fact that anything is possible to the camera. An airship, for example, may be printed into a cloud effect but the result would scarcely be worth the time spent in making the negative—and the photo-playwright who knowingly resorts to trick photography in planning his script materially reduces his chances of acceptance. There are hundreds of airship dramatic pictures submitted and none shown. The deduction is obvious. The intelligent writer will wait until the science of aviation is better understood before writing the aeroplane story.

Lighting Effects.

Lighting effects may be tricked but it is well to leave the lighting to the director. The light in the studio is, or should be, under perfect control by means of stopping down, the use of electricity and daylight in combination and the employment of the spot light, but the author who depends upon light effects to get his story accepted builds upon a very unstable foundation. The suggestion of moonlight or lamplight is sometimes conveyed by means of dyes, a red tone suggesting a conflagration, green or blue moonlight and yellow lamplight, but toning is an added cost that seldom yields returns and it is better to hold to daylight scenes.

By stopping down the lens the suggestion of semi-darkness is had but such pictures appear muddy upon the screen and detract from the general effect of the picture. Write your picture without other reference to lighting effects than to explain which scenes are supposed to occur outdoors at night, for unless you are intimately acquainted with the particular studio to which submission is made you court the rejection of your manuscript.

It is sufficient that you offer a properly constructed plot. The stage manager will look after the effects far better than the inexperienced writer can hope to do.

At a convention of the Illinois State Society of Opthalmologists at the Palmer House in Chicago, President E. M. Heidkamp gave some good advice recently anent the proper care of eyes. In referring to the alleged danger to the eye from looking at moving pictures he remarked that "moving picture entertainments may possibly give you a headache, but will never affect the sight." Of course a headache will result from almost anything which requires prolonged mental concentration. The comic pictures in the program seem a good antidote.

MONTGOMERY OPENS ATLANTA HOUSE.

The Montgomery Amusement Company, of Jacksonville, Fla., operating the Grand Theater here, opened their Atlanta, Ga., house, The Montgomery, on August 1st. The seating capacity is four hundred and fifty and for the first two days the paid admissions were over ten thousand and in addition to this some paper had been issued. This house is conceded to be one of the finest houses in America devoted to motion pictures.

The high plane on which all of this company's houses are operated places them in immediate favor, and the Atlanta house will prove no exception to the established reputation. H. C.

Dorsey is vice-president of the company as well as manager of the Atlanta house. The Columbia, S. C., house, The Grand, under the management of Mr. George C. Warner, formerly of Jacksonville, has done a thriving business since the opening six months ago.

On August 19 the Montgomery Amusement Co. will assume the management of the Folly and Odeon theaters at Savannah, Ga. Many improvements will be made at the Odeon, but the Folly, being a new house, will be continued as it is with no interruption. The policy of both houses will be in advance to the Montgomery idea. M. C. Eberstein will continue as manager for a few weeks, the new managers not having been appointed. It is the custom of this company to select managers from the stockholders and this policy will be adhered to, and a practical showman is given each manager as an assistant.

J. T. Alsop, Jr., manager of the Jacksonville house, The Grand, is also secretary and treasurer of the Montgomery Amusement Co., and as this is the home of the company, all business being handled at this end, he has several office assistants in addition to those in the house. Montgomery's houses cater only to the best element in each community and quality in pictures and music is offered rather than quantity. The patronage accorded all of the houses proves the wisdom of this policy and the name of Montgomery is always a guarantee of the highest class offerings of the motion picture field.

Mr. Montgomery is at present in Atlanta and will remain for several weeks longer attending to the many matters incidental to the opening of a new house. On completion of all the extensive plans now contemplated by the company, Mr. Montgomery, as president, will regularly visit all the houses for a few days of each month in order to keep in touch with the demands and requirements of the several localities.

Joseph Schmidt, secretary of the Anti-Bread Trust Conference, representing the Baker's Union of New York, New Jersey and Connecticut, plans to fight the bread trust by the aid of moving pictures, slides and posters.

The Working Man's Presbyterian Church and the Labor Temple, under the supervision of Rev. Charles Stelzle, located in the lower east side of New York City, have installed moving pictures, which are exhibited in connection with the daily services.

CHICAGO LETTER.

By Jas. S. McQuade.

LICENSED exhibitors should be thoroughly familiar with the exhibitors' bulletin sent out by the Motion Picture Patents Co. under date of May 29. This bulletin, in substance, drew attention to the fact that, after June 1, licensed manufacturers were likely to use ordinary as well as N-I. stock in printing their films. Exchanges have the option of specifying either N-I. or ordinary films when ordering.

In recent conversation with a licensed exhibitor he informed me that all first runs received by him for several weeks past have been printed on ordinary or inflammable stock, and that he had not been notified to that effect by his exchange. On discovering that the films were of the ordinary stock he immediately notified his operator to be more careful in handling them.

All licensed exhibitors should see to it that similar instructions should be given operators and thus carefully guard against fires in picture theaters, knowing that the daily press will make the most out of such conflagrations to discredit these places of amusement.

The N-I. stock has failed in two important particulars, notwithstanding the efforts put forth by the Eastman Co. to turn out a satisfactory product: it has proved to be brittle within a short period of use, the sprocket holes especially being unequal to the strain of constant use, and it has failed to the city ordinance of March 28, 1910, which regulates the ordinary product for photographic effects.

With the improved type of fireproof booths now installed in picture theaters throughout the country, and the rigorous laws enforced by municipal authorities as to the number of films in a booth, and their care while the program is being given, the chances of a blaze are reduced to a minimum when the operator discharges his duties conscientiously and intelligently. Moreover, the Gilmore fireproof box for one, two, three or more films—which has been tested and approved by representatives of the Chicago fire department and fire patrol—ensures absolute immunity from fire of all films in the booth, except the one in the projecting machine.

The attention of Chicago exhibitors is especially directed to the city ordinance of March 28, 1910, which regulates the number of reels in an operating booth while pictures are being run. It reads as follows:

"Not exceeding five moving picture films shall be kept or stored in any operating room, where moving pictures are being produced, and such films shall at all times, except while being changed on the moving picture machine be kept within the aforesaid tin cans or metal boxes of galvanized iron."

Any person violating the provisions of this ordinance is subject to a fine of not less than $5 and not more than $100 for each offense; every day, during which such violation continues, being considered a separate and distinct offense.

The recent fire in the Lincoln theater, this city, has led to a strict investigation by the authorities as to the number of films stored in the booth at the time. It being rumored that there were more than the stipulated number, the operator of the theater has been subpoenaed by the authorities to appear before them and testify.

That Patented Ventilating Apparatus.

From information received from several exhibitors in Chicago regarding the ventilation of new picture theatres, it appears that Mr. Ball, of the Sanitary Department at the City Hall, is in favor of the installation of a certain patented apparatus in every new picture theatre that will pump 1,500 cubic feet of air per hour, for each person, through the floor of the auditorium. It is also proposed that old theatres shall be included. The owner of the patented apparatus, it is learned, is an Eastern man.

In the building ordinance, which regulates the ventilation of picture theatres, passed about a year ago, Article XX has this clause: "The air in every room of Class IV and V (picture theatres are included in Class IV), hereafter erected shall be changed so as to provide each person, for whom seating accommodation is provided in such auditorium, with at least 1,500 cubic feet of air per hour." Another clause in the same ordinance provides that 1,200 cubic feet of air per person, per hour, shall be furnished in theatres already built at the time of passing the ordinance. Still another clause regulates that no part of the air shall be taken from the cellar or basement.

It is the intention, so it is understood, to have this ordinance amended so that the patented apparatus referred to shall be solely used for ventilating purposes.

Dr. G. Gottfried, assistant commissioner of the Health Department of Chicago, was seen regarding the proposed change in the ordinance, and he stated that he had no knowledge of it. Furthermore, he asserted that any patented apparatus, least of all, would receive the sanction of the department, and gave, as his opinion, that such an amendment would fail to be passed by the Council in case it was brought before that body.

The local organization of exhibitors should keep a watchful eye on the proposed amendment, as it looks very much like an attempt to exploit the builders of new picture theatres in Chicago.

It is preposterous that, in these days of progressive invention, picture theatre owners should be compelled to use a ventilating device that may be thrown on the scrap pile the week after next. And this patented device pumps the air through the floor of the auditorium. Oh, shades of health and hygiene!

Local Association Meeting.

At the last regular meeting of the Chicago Exhibitors' Association, Monday, August 7th, the members voted that all who can possibly get away from their theatres will visit and inspect the Selig Polyscope plant, in accordance with the invitation extended them by Mr. Selig several weeks ago.

Friday, August 25th, has been fixed as the date, subject to Mr. Selig's approval. The members have been advised that Mr. Selig has arranged to use all the visitors in a large scene of a picture that will be produced specially on that date.

The delegates to the national convention at Cleveland stated in open meeting that too much praise could not be bestowed on the Cleveland exhibitors for their magnificent hospitality and cordial reception to visiting delegates. Thanks also were moved acknowledging the aid from the Cleveland delegates in bringing the national convention of 1912 to Chicago.

It was announced that the membership of the Association had increased from 275 to 280 since last meeting. The financial secretary also reported the treasury in good condition.

Former Freeporter in Selig Western Drama.

It is not often that a moving picture show raises applause to the fever point from the fact that a well-known citizen of the city in which the film is produced has taken a prominent part in the production. This occurred recently in the Majestic Theatre, Freeport, when O. B. Thayer, a former Freeporter, was recognized as Dan, the sheriff, in Selig's picture, "The Warrant." Mr. Thayer made a typical Wild West sheriff, and the picture was pronounced one of the best of its kind produced by Selig's Western company.

First Class Chicago Theater for Pictures?

There was a persistent rumor last week that Jones, Linnick & Schaefer, the well known owners of the Orpheum and an extensive chain of theaters in this city, has secured a lease on McVicker's Theater for moving pictures.

It is known that Morton Cohn, who formerly ran a licensed exchange in Portland, Ore., and who owns diversified interests there, offered $1,000 per week, or $52,000 per year, a short time ago, for a term lease on the house, and that the negotiations fell through. Mr. Cohn sought to obtain McVicker's for moving pictures, and it is reported that the consummation of the deal depended on his demonstrating that moving pictures come under the head of "legitimate entertainment."

It appears that the will governing the McVicker estate has a clause providing that the McVicker Theater must always be used for "legitimate" attractions. It may be that the judgment of a court of law may yet be required to establish the legitimacy of pictures.

Aaron J. Jones, head of the Jones, Linnick & Schaefer firm, has been in Colorado Springs, Colo., for the past two months, and is expected to return about August 23d. He is a far-seeing, clear-visioned business man, full of enterprise and always ready to take a chance when the outlook is at all favorable. It would not surprise me if he and his firm have some big transactions to spring on moving picture circles in the near future.

If Lyman H. Howe made such a financial success with the exhibition of moving pictures—75 per cent. of which were licensed films, which had been shown in the smaller theaters here, many months, and some of them years ago—in a first-class theater, what is to hinder enterprising Chicago men, skilled in the business and possessed of the necessary means, to find a home for pictures, where they can be shown amid the most attractive surroundings and with the best accompanying effects yet evolved? Such a house, at 25, 35 and 50 cents, will make a fortune. It will create many thousands of regular picture theater goers—men and women who have always had an aversion to mix with the crowd. Why not give them a picture temple where they may have equal facilities for segregation as when viewing a grand opera or a high class drama?

The moving picture appeals to all classes. Let our picture theaters be so diversified as to appeal to all classes.

Hygienic Picture by Essanay.

How Chicago's babies are being cared for during the summer months has been realistically filmed by the Essanay Company. This work of attending to the babies in congested districts of Chicago is being conducted under the direction of Dr. Geo. H. Young, health commissioner, and his staff, and by his permission the privilege was granted to take moving pictures showing the system of operation.

The pictures show the day's work of the field nurses of the Health Department as they go about Chicago caring for the sick babies. Starting as they leave the City Hall for their rounds in the morning, the views follow them into the tents maintained by the Elizabeth McCormick fund.

Babies poor and wasted from the hot weather attacks are shown in their hovel homes with father loafing around the home. The nurse enters the home and takes charge and directs the caring for the infant. When she leaves, the baby, clean and coolly dressed, covered with a bit of clean white mosquito netting, is lying in its crib.

The father reluctantly obeys the nurse's repeated request to carry away the malodorous garbage. Before the arrival of the nurse he is shown drinking a can of beer and passing it to his wife and then to the baby.

These pictures, showing the real conditions, and posters describing the results of the milk fed and beer fed baby by the appearance of the child in a congress of babies, some crying and some laughing, give a good idea of the noble work that is being done.

"Summer Babies" will be released Tuesday, August 22. The film is 600 feet in length.

Gotch-Hackenschmidt Bout.

The Empire Athletic Club officials were approached Thursday, August 10, by the local representative of the Moving Picture Patents Company and asked to name a price for which the company could purchase outright the pictures of the Gotch-Hackenschmidt match soon to be held in Chicago. The question is under consideration and a decision will be sent to the officials of the Patents Company, at their semi-annual meeting Monday and Tuesday evenings, August 14 and 15, in New York.

Chicago Film Brevities.

Mr. and Mrs. John O. Verhoeven returned home from their honeymoon trip Friday, August 4th.

Moving Picture Harvey and his partner, L. A. Moran, were visitors at The World office last week. They own the Nazawan and the Corner theatres at Decatur, Ills., the latter being the old Colonial theatre, which they purchased, and, after remodeling, opened on August 21st. While in the city, Mr. Harvey and Mr. Moran visited the Selig plant. Mr. Harvey reports fair business during the summer months.

C. A. Kent, principal of the Audubon School, 3500 North Hoyne Avenue, this city, called at The World office last week. Mr. Kent was formerly superintendent of schools in Charles City, Iowa, a position held by him for five years. He was also secretary of the Chautauqua branch in that city for three years. Mr. Kent always took a lively interest in moving pictures and made it a point to master the projecting machine. He ran a projection machine in Charles City for two years, showing pictures for the benefit of the Chautauqua branch, his films being rented from George Kleine. During his residence in Chicago, Mr. Kent has continued his interest in moving pictures, and is putting forth his best efforts to employ them in his school for the teaching of geography. Last May he took the examination before the moving picture examining board in this city for moving picture operators and passed with high honors.

The Auditorium in Saginaw, Mich., with a seating capacity of 4,000, will soon offer programs of an educational, hygienic and scientific type, the course being given under the direction of the Auditorium's board of trustees.

C. C. Pyle, assistant to F. C. Aiken, manager of the G. F. Co.'s branch at 17-19 South Wabash, left for a fortnight's vacation Wednesday, August 9th. He was accompanied by Mrs. Pyle to Pines, Wis., where their vacation will be spent.

Richard Mann, of Chicago, has purchased the Photoplay theatre, an independent house, at 4654 Wentworth Avenue. The house was closed when Mr. Mann purchased it, and was opened by him Wednesday, August 9th. Licensed service from the G. F. Co.'s branch at 17-19 South Wabash will be used henceforth.

R. S. and H. F. Beatty have purchased the Palace theatre, 5903 South State Street. They opened the house Saturday, August 12th, with a licensed service. The Palace was formerly independent.

F. Spaulding, manager of the Columbine theatre, Galva, Ills., was a visitor last week. The Columbine is a new house, built by Mr. Spaulding, and has been open for three months. Licensed service is used.

J. D. Blume, owner of the Gem theatre, Macomb, Ills., recently purchased the Lyric theatre at Monmouth, Ills., from Frank Richardson. The Lyric was formerly independent. It will be opened August 14th with licensed service furnished by the G. F. Co.'s branch, 17-19 South Wabash.

Dr. David Heagle, a Chautauqua lecturer for the State of Illinois, has arranged with Manager Aiken at 17-19 South Wabash for the renting of "Solomon's Temple" and "Ben Hur" for use with his lectures. He has also arranged for the "Panama Canal" (Edison) and "Herod, the New Born King" (Gaumont) for use at the close of his lectures.

A. M. Eisher, in charge of the booking department of the G. F. Co.'s branch office at 17-19 South Wabash, returned from his two weeks' vacation at Kennedy's Lake, near Niles, Mich., last week.

Dan E. Rice will open the new Orpheum theatre at Hancock, Mich., Monday, August 14th. He will feature the "Elks" Convention" (Edison), recently held at Atlantic City, at the opening, and will continue it for three days.

W. J. Sweeney reopened the Standard theatre, this city, Saturday, August 5th, after renovating and remodeling the interior.

"Big" Otto, the animal trainer at the Selig Polyscope plant, recently presented William N. Selig with a large lion's claw, beautifully set in gold. On one side a Shriner's emblem appears in relief and on the other the trademark of the Selig product. The original owner of the claw was killed during the production of "Back to the Primitive."

A. J. Gilligham, manager of the General Film Company's branch at Detroit, paid a visit to the city last week. Mr. Gilligham informed me that every downtown theatre in Detroit was using the licensed service. He reported that business was very fair throughout the hot spell, which was the hottest in forty years.

Thos. O'Day, who had charge of the Johnson arrangements in the Jeffries-Johnson fight film, spent a day in the city last week on his way from New York to Frisco. Mr. O'Day stated that his receipts from the film brought out a balance on the right side of the ledger.

FITCH GETS FUN OUT OF THE FILMS.

George Fitch, a humorist of some note and a frequent contributor to the Saturday Evening Post, is the editor of the Herald-Transcript, of Peoria, Ill. Being an enthusiastic picture fan, he is a constant attendant at the Peoria picture houses and delights in printing his impressions in the columns of his paper. Here is one of his "wheezes" after having seen Selig's "Captain Kate":

"The moving pictures are getting more wonderful right along. On Sunday one Peoria theater showed a film which was obtained in the African jungle. In this picture a lion and lioness sneaked stealthily out of the thicket, pounced on a wart hog, killed him and trotted off, the lion carrying the heavy victim in his jaws as a cat would carry a mouse. Later on the lion fell into a native trap, stalked a beautiful, lady, wild animal hunter and was attacked by two tame leopards who saved the life of their mistress.

"Incidentally, this shows up some of the joys of the moving picture job. Chasing a hungry lion through an African jungle and persuading him to stop and look pleasant now and then for the benefit of the gaping millions back in America is not what one might call a parlor game. When wars have ceased and automobile races are no more, we imagine the heroes of the day will be the grim and dauntless moving picture men who will be dodging in and out of the jaws of volcanoes, sidestepping avalanches and rushing valiantly after tornadoes with their omniverous machines."

Animated pictures of the works of one of the largest stone companies of Sandusky, Ohio, have been taken, showing every little detail in the art of blasting stones from the earth. Four tremendous blasts are shown dislodging over 50,000 tons of stone.

With the Western Producers

Miss Elaine Davis, ingenue of the Selig Co., was wedded to Mr. Trussell, a millionaire and an official of the Gould lines last week. Mr. Trussell supplied the company with several boxes of twenty-five cent perfectos as a wedding gift. The newly wedded couple left for the East in a palatial private car.

The "live wire" policy of the Selig Co. was shown in their recent record breaking run to the wreck of the S. S. Santa Rosa off Point Arguelle. This will be released in one of the most pretentious marine dramas ever attempted.

Every afternoon, after working hours, Hobart Bosworth sheds the mantle of Thespis and takes on that of a swimming instructor. So far his efforts in teaching deficient members of the company to swim have been highly successful.

While Al. Earnest Garcia was posing on the edge of the tank in a brand new suit, for the benefit of some visiting ladies, a player, quite accidentally of course, jostled him, cane and all, into the water. Some acting the producer didn't order, business of being white with rage, etc.

The portals of the studio are guarded by a heavy iron gate in charge of a grizzled old man with fierce mustachios. He is playfully referred to by the company as St. Peter. Some one told me on the side that Pete had a contract with Selig to raise tooth brushes for the company. He didn't let Peter hear him, though.

Operations at Kalem's Western Studio have been delayed for over a week owing to the non-arrival of a shipment of film.

Carlysle Blackwell is Kalem's juvenile lead. His wife is known theatrically as Ruth Hartmann, and sister of Gretchen Hartmann who created the original role of "Mary Jane" with Henry E. Dixey in "Mary Jane's Pa." Ruth Hartmann played the part of "Lucile Perkins" with the same company.

Miss Alice Joyce has so completely won the hearts of the Glendale yokels that she is forced to run a most embarrassing gantlet of admirers each time she walks down the street.

The latest addition to Kalem's forces is William (Bill) West, widely known in theatrical circles.

Nat. C. Goodwin's producing company is an accomplished fact. The name of the company has been given out variously as the Fox Picture Co. and the Co-Operative Co. To date nothing definite has been decided on. The company will be comprised of such notables as Nat. Goodwin, McKee Rankin, Lewis Stone, Marjorie Rambeau, etc., as both owners and players. Mr. Bennett, of the Bennett Indian Trading Co., is also a heavy holder and will have charge of the costuming. He has promised us some Indian stuff never seen before in any film. The first productions of this company will be "David Garrick, an American Citizen," and most of Mr. Goodwin's past successes. RUSSELL BURGESS.

W. E. Atkinson, formerly a member of the Allentown Kinemacolor Company, was in the city last week and purchased the state rights of Kinemacolor for Texas and Oklahoma. He will open at Dallas, Texas, August 28. A Powers No. 6, specially equipped for Kinemacolor, was purchased by Mr. Atkinson. He will show in first class houses only.

Joe Driscoll, for several years a prominent exhibitor in New York City, has disposed of all his picture theater interests and has formed a special entertainment for Roman Catholic churches and societies. His program includes many Irish subjects and others of a semi-religious nature.

"THE FLYING A" BUNGALOW.

The Western Stock Company of the American Film Manufacturing Company in El Cajon Valley, Southern California.

W. W. Kerrigan, Peter Morrison, Jim Morrison, Geo. Periolat, Robert Coffee, Allan Owen, Warren Kerrigan, Louise Lester, Mrs. Morrison, Pauline Bush, A. G. Heimeral, Jack Richardson, S. Beal.

The intelligent looking coterie of moving picture artists included in the Western stock company of the American Company, and pictured above, we are informed are one of the happiest and most enthusiastic aggregations of moving picture people in the West. The contented facial expression of the artists in the picture, reproduced above confirms this assertion.

Official League Announcement.

Scope and Purpose of the New Exhibitors' Organization Outlined by Secretary Christenson.

Secretary Christenson, of the Moving Picture League of America, issues the following pronunciamento regarding the purpose and plans of that organization:

"On August 1, 2 and 3, 1911, there met in Cleveland, Ohio, a convention of the moving picture exhibitors of the United States and Canada. There were present at this convention 300 members, representing 2,200 exhibitors, and the association was formed hereafter to be known as "The Moving Picture League of America," to be chartered under the laws of the State of Ohio.

"The officers elected by the Association are as follows: President, M. A. Neff, Mercantile Library Building, Cincinnati, O.; Secretary, C. M. Christenson, 703 Euclid Ave., Cleveland, O.; Treasurer, J. J. Rieder, Temple Theater, Jackson, Mich. Any communication, regarding business connected with this Association may be addressed to the secretary at the above named address.

"Memberships are open to every bona fide exhibitor in the United States or Canada, providing said exhibitor is not connected, in any way, with the manufacturing of films or film exchanges. This association is for exhibitors only. Let there be no misunderstanding as to membership. In any state where there are five or more members comprising a State Association of Moving Picture Exhibitors, the association may join the Moving Picture League of America. In states where there is no organization, an individual wishing to become a member of The Moving Picture League of America may make application to the State Association in an adjoining state. The initial membership fee of a state organization to The Moving Picture League of America is ten dollars, thereafter a per capita tax of twenty-five cents per year. Let it be understood that The Moving Picture League of America recognizes only one Association in each state. If there are two, or more, so-called state organizations, they must become one before they can be affiliated with the National Association.

"Every exhibitor interested in the betterment of his business, and of the conditions affecting same, should immediately become a member of his State Association, and urge its union with The Moving Picture League of America at once.

"On the second Tuesday of August, 1912, at Chicago, Illinois, will be held the second annual convention of The Moving Picture League of America, and we expect the largest attendance of any convention ever held in that city. We also expect this organization, at that time, to be the most powerful and far-reaching in its scope, and in its particular field of endeavor, of any association hitherto known.

"The purposes of this organization are self-protection, to raise the standard of motion picture films, to secure recognition on the National Censor Board, the regulation of prices for film service, to prevent breaches of contract on the part of film exchanges, to regulate insurance rates, to secure protection against adverse legislation, to regulate the rental of films to large playhouses during their idle seasons, to adjust difficulties with labor and the adjustment of many other minor matters of importance to the exhibitor, individually and collectively.

"We demand recognition from every branch of the moving picture industry throughout the world. Every local organization having any grievance must state such grievance in concise terms, furnish proof thereof, and then forward same to the state organization, and the state organization will forward it to The Moving Picture League of America for adjustment. This association is founded on business principles alone, and the officers have pledged their best endeavors to secure the accomplishment of long needed reforms in the moving picture business.

"C. M. CHRISTENSON, Secretary."

PERSONAL.

Karl W. Bornschein, manager of the Elite theaters of Ellis, Russell, Hayes and Ellsworth, Kansas, arrived in New York last week for the purpose of securing the state rights for Dante's Inferno pictures for Western territory. While in the city he paid the Moving Picture World a pleasant call. Mr. Bornschein's houses are reputed to be among the best in the West.

P. D. Hayes, of Malone, N. Y., was a welcome visitor at the office of the Moving Picture World last week. It was his first visit to New York and he reported that the big town had nothing on his town in the way of a picture theater. Mr. Hayes verified our editorial opinion of several weeks ago in an article entitled "The Exhibitor as a Teacher," that he is the kind of exhibitor that we liked to know.

DEATH OF NOTED FILM ACTOR.

Verner Clarges, a member of the Biograph Stock Company, died at his residence in New York City on August 11. With his death passes one of the actors of the old school. He was born in England sixty-three years ago and has been for over forty years engaged in the profession of acting.

His work has always been of the scholarly kind and principally confined to classical plays. For many years he has been principally known and noted in old man character parts, and as such he joined the Biograph Company a few years ago. Mr. Clarges in his time was associated with many of the best known legitimate theatrical stars of America, but none of those associations were any more congenial to him than the closing of his career as an actor with the Biograph Company. He was active until within a few days of his death, acting for the camera. One of his last appearances was in a Biograph play soon to be relcased, entitled "Swords and Hearts." This film is reviewed elsewhere in this issue and one of the scenes shows Mr. Clarges in the part of the elder Frazer, bidding his son good-bye as he leaves his home to fight for the Confederacy.

A GREAT TRIUMPH.

Dante's Inferno (Milano Films) Scores Complete Financial Success at Auditorium Theater in Baltimore.

In mentioning the question of higher prices for feature attractions, The Moving Picture World said in its issue of July 29th:

The financial profits of this enterprise are not to be gathered by "crowding them in" as fast as possible and then "chasing them out" again, but by a substantial advance in the prices. The hackneyed objection that the public will not spend money on a "moving picture" and is unable to dissociate the picture from the small currency of the Republic is not well taken. In the first place travelogues with moving pictures have brought good prices, but that is the minor reason. The better answer to the objection is that Dante's Inferno is indeed a "different kind of moving picture." The attempt to get substantial prices need only be made to be successful.

No prophecy was ever followed more quickly by a more literal fulfillment. On its first production in the Auditorium Theater at Baltimore, Md., last Monday, Dante's Inferno (Milano Films Company), at prices ranging from 25 to 75 cents, was completely sold out in the early part of the evening. Considering the fearful heat and the fact that the regular patrons of the theater, which is the highest priced show house in the city, were to a great extent either in the mountains or at the seaside, this showing is nothing short of marvelous.

The finest theatrical attraction that had ever come to the "Monumental City" could not boast a better quality of audience than the brilliant and representative gathering that greeted the immortal work of Dante.

The introductory remarks by Mr. W. Stephen Bush, who had been engaged to take charge of a proper presentation of the film, were listened to with keen attention. Mr. Bush said in the course of his address, that the better kind of audience had long been ready for the better kind of picture, a fact which was demonstrated by both the quantity and quality of the audience, which he had the pleasure of seeing before him. The moving picture of the higher kind, the feature attraction, that belongs on the stages of the big theaters of the country was so far rather a rare thing. This was not the fault of the public, but of exhibitors and producers, who were haunted by a mysterious fear that anything above a cowboy story or a cheap comedy was utterly beyond the comprehension of the American public. The appearance of a considerable portion of the public that night proves that such classic attractions as Dante's Inferno were well appreciated. Mr. Bush outlined briefly the story of Beatrice and Dante, the origin of the Divine Comedy, the filming of the immortal work by the Milano Films Company and its stupendous success from an artistic point of view.

After an interlude of special and appropriate music the performance began, Mr. Bush lecturing on the whole five reels with brief intermissions, which were filled in with proper music and careful and well rehearsed effects. Generous applause came from the audience at the end of every reel. The press and clergy were especially kind to the picture and gave it unbounded praise.

The presentation of this film marks truly an epoch in the history of moving pictures. It has added and as the days go on will constantly add prestige to the moving picture art. It will win most desirable friends for the photoplay everywhere. It has destroyed the absurd idea, that people will not pay high prices for a moving picture entertainment, regardless of its high character.

CROAK No. 1

By Tadpole.

MY very, very dear Mr. Editor; with the bulk of the emphasis on the two "verys" and the remainder on the "dear." Though this is the first time I have addressed you, none the less the name under which I write is not altogether unknown to you. Some days ago I visited several nickel shows—I beg your pardon—I mean moving picture theaters; "nickel show" is the name I used to give moving picture theaters—but that was before I came to see the great value of the moving picture film.

Six years ago I had not seen a moving picture—then I saw some, then a few more, and then I became disgusted and remained so for quite a while—you see, I happen to be one of those disreputable, undesirable persons who kick. I could not see the sense of fleet horses and bloodhounds chasing for miles a wounded hero and not catching him, especially when the pursuers never faltered or changed their course, but went quickly in one direction while the brave hero, wounded, staggered with every step, occasionally falling, and when not staggering and falling he was stopping to look around in at least three directions to see if the bloodhounds and the galloping horses were gaining on him; yet, strange to say, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred his pursuers were unsuccessful.

I have frequently seen a single individual, improperly armed, beat off a whole horde of Indians or desperadoes who were armed with modern weapons. Things like that, and a heap of other ridiculous stuff that would fit in with no psychology nor show itself worthy of any form of criticism, caused unnumbered people to turn from the moving picture with a disgust that still lives, only, happily, not so much so now as in the past. Just as there are remnants of disgust still remaining, so also in the films there are the remnants of the cause. There are still authors writing fools-head plays and manufacturers making fools-head films. One wonders if there is a dearth of presentable plays or if there is another cause for the introduction of elements into modern picture plays that are very displeasing to thinking people.

A few days ago I saw a dozen films placed upon the screen; these films, from the point of view of a person like myself, who once was very desirous of joining some public movement, or trying to create one, for the suppression of moving picture shows, and also from the view of those sincerely interested financially and otherwise in moving pictures, were very comforting. Only one out of the dozen could be considered objectionable and that simply on account of its utter silliness.

It was not comedy.
It was not drama.
It was not burlesque.
It was not tragedy.
It was not educational.

The picture had no scenic value. It was just utter silliness; its title, "Fools-head's Jealousy," written evidently on the assumption that a certain percentage of every audience is a fool-head class of people. It was the only detrimental picture in the dozen. A man next me who had praised the preceding picture which was "Foxy Grandma," swore, rose from his seat and went out. The following are the dozen films: "Fools-head's Jealousy," "Mission Worker," "Black Heart," "Gambler's Chance," "Hidden Mine," "The Orphan's Friend," "In Little Old New York," "A Hero Almost," "Changing of Silas Warner," "The Professor's Ward," "Game of Deception," "Foxy Grandma."

"Gambler's Chance."—The hero here is the gambler; he mortgages his property to such an extent that if he loses the money he will be ruined. He is a fine business man—take heed, all ye failures—he has time to mortgage his property, but not time to take the money to the share brokers himself, so he places it in an ordinary paper envelope and gives it in charge of the very reliable office boy, who is seen doing nothing but throwing dice; said reliable office boy afterwards seen in street engaged in a game of chance with other boys, the envelope containing the money carried openly in his left hand. Boy, of course, is late to the broker's office, finds it closed, then returns to reap his reward of hugs, kisses, etc., because he neglected his duty and incidentally save his boss from utter ruin, who swears to God he will never, never, be so naughty again.

"In Little Old New York"—Methinks that if the film maker had called this subject "A Bird's-eye and Other Views of New York" and had done the job as well as he could have done it, it would have been truly educational. There are two ideas in this film, if we forget the dollar aspect of all films—these two are (1), showing views of New York; and (2), trying to sell you some laughs. Of the first, the pictures are fair—not really good; of the second, the means used is the old, threadbare stunt of having a simpleton walk through the streets of a city followed by crowds of other simpletons—that's all.

"A Hero Almost."—Is very fair comedy, there is some clean humor; one wishes at times, however, that the moving picture actors would be a little more original and not so conspicuously conventional in swearing an oath to a deed.

"The Orphan's Friend."—What a lot of orphans there have been lately in moving picture characters. I suppose, however, that has some relation to the epidemic of deaths in the films. I remember one Saturday counting no less than five or six deaths from natural causes, on the screens. One picture had two deaths in it, they both died in the course of a few days, they both died in the same room—at the same table—not in bed—and they were both related to the heroine; one was her mother, the other was her father—it was so interesting.

As I looked at these five or six deaths, some of them emphasizing facial death agonies, I wondered how young, sensitive children would be improved by this show of exaggerated death struggles—exaggerated because the camera work was so distinct by enlargement on the screen. Convulsions and choking were the favorite characteristics of the death agonies. Had I had a child with me I would either have left the theater or have taken the child's attention from the screen. It is to be hoped that these horrors will be cut out; deaths can be introduced without being made objectionable.

"Hidden Mine."—This is fairly good, but cannot be called strong in the plot. With the exception of a few minor faults, due entirely to stage management, nothing worse can be said. It is far superior to much that is placed on the screens.

"Mission Worker."—The photography is much the best part of this film and for that reason it will be well liked by a good percentage of audiences, but the Tadpole doesn't think the author would suffer much from brain fag in working out the idea. The whole film is much weakened in its effect by the conspicuously un-Chinese faces of those representing the Chinese, there is no attempt even by paint to give the almond effect to the eyes of these characters. There is, however, another good feature to this film in the teaching—don't run away to do good work—there's lots to do at home.

"Black Heart."—In this there is a good deal of foolishness. I don't mean humor. Two men are in love (or something else), with one woman. She is married to the bad one, he bullies her, she is shot—second man runs off with her baby—lives with a squaw for sixteen years with stolen child—father of child turns up—trouble—then happy ending. The whole thing is a pitiable stop gap in the absence of something good. Let us turn to some of its details.

First important one—husband is bullying wife and strikes her heavily. Hero comes in, he has no revolver; he gives the husband a heavy punch in jaw—hubby falls to floor—then rises. The two men are about the same size, the husband has a revolver and the hero has none, yet the hubby takes his punishment as mildly as if he were chewing angel cake. Hero departs; dear hubby again punches his wife, but before doing so remembers he has a gun—this he carefully places on the table—wife then takes revolver—hubby closes with her—struggle—wife shot. Hubby lets her tumble to the floor then goes for a walk, for he does not fetch either a policeman or a doctor. Hero returns while hubby is having his walk—wife dies in hero's arms—hero rushes off with baby. Hubby returns just in time to see hero with child. One peculiarity is that the house has no visible door—no pathway and no gate in the fence. Therefore both hero and husband always, to enter house, have to climb a fence—run across a plot of ground and enter the house at the back, which is close to a factory or other building.

Queries.—Why did the hero run away with the baby? Why did he not give notice to police of possible murder? Hero is seen two days later running around in the forest with that poor baby in his arms, two days! you Mothers! two days. What think you on't? Not a spoonful of food, not a drop of milk, not even a rubber tube and bottle, and, ye gods—not bit of trouble. How now, you fathers? You who have done even as I, pressed the dear little darlings to your manly bosoms, nursed them fondly and lovingly on your strong knees, then with very visible change of countenance, as sudden as a streak of greased lightning, you tell your wife to take the little brat. Could you, Mr. Fond Papa, run around for two full days in a forest with a baby in your arms? No, sir! No! I say; because you are not a stage manager nor an author of moving picture plays, though I doubt not you were a moving picture, as you told the wife to take the brat. But oh! what a silly I am; that kid must have been a dummy, and yet it could not have been, for sixteen years later we see the hero, and the baby, and the baby's lover and the squaw, who presumably is the wife of the hero. Then the grown baby and her lover discover a gold mine or some other equally common thing—ready made—real father turns up—claims daughter—accuses hero of murdering his wife—is then persuaded to change his mind by a stab in the back of the neck with a knife (clearly made from a piece of half-inch lumber) in the hand of the squaw. Thinking he is going to die, he confesses that not the hero, but he himself murdered his wife, though the "leader" at the time of the deed distinctly said, "shot by accident." However, everybody lives happy ever after. It is a hashup all through.

And now, dear unsophisticated reader, having chewed most of the bread from off my sandwiches, I come to the meat—though there are still some crumbs left.

"Game of Deception."—This is really good comedy and, according to its nature, well played throughout. The Tadpole thinks, however, that this true son of a—er—parson might have been given time to get in the house before he had the Bible pushed into his paws; also, methinks, the wine and cards were emphasized a little too much. And did you notice, you house proud Momers and Popers, how careful these boys were in throwing down their lighted cigarettes on the Turkish carpets? One of them actually went to the trouble of pressing the fire of his cigarette into the carpet with his shoe. Acts like these do not improve either the dramatic or the comedy values, whereas there was a good chance missed of putting in a little extra healthy fun in the attempt to get those cigarettes out of the sight of the girls. None the less I, even I, say it was a good comedy.

"The Professor's Ward."—A rich, lively, gem of comedy, plenty of bubble and foam, without any of the objectionable dregs one frequently sees introduced into some would-be-funny films. Tadpole, however, thinks that the acting of the ward immediately following the proposal, is not good psychology. For a girl to laugh at and jolly a man immediately after he has paid her the greatest compliment a man can pay a woman, even though he joins in the laugh himself, implies an attitude of flighty insincerity and disregard that would not be shown by a woman of good manners in such a position, unless—unless it was in a moving picture. Again there is a good deal of exaggerated tomboyishness on the part of the ward to her guardian; this, however, the audience takes fine, showing by the ripples and bursts of laughter that they are richly enjoying the fun. The same may be said of the un-professorial run of the professor from the seat of the tree to the fence in the distance—but, you know, it is so easy to laugh when you see him run; and—listen, ye creators of horrible death-bed scenes—it is psychologically impossible for any man, woman or child to laugh without feeling the good internally and without that good radiating from him until it permeates the surrounding atmosphere, making others feel that life, after all, is worth living. The man who sells clean, healthy laughs to humanity is doing his fellows a service, even though his methods are not always strictly psychologically true. The combination of human effort to please in this film is highly commendable.

"Foxy Grandma."—Oh you dear, darling Foxy, why did you not come sooner—we have been waiting so long—and please will you leave many children and grandchildren to follow you? Films of your kind are required to lift onto a higher plane the financial appetites of most producers. The riff-raff that some of the producers put out makes us turn with longing eyes to you—but oh, Granny, why, with all your wit, after showing up the fortune hunter, did you so readily agree to the parasitic attachment to your granddaughter, to that whimpering weeper in the person of the farm boy? I say parasitic attachment because she would have to support him; no man having spirit or grit enough to keep a wife would be so unmanly as to whimper and weep because the girl of his choice turned him down. No, Grandma dear, what you ought to have given him was a bottle of milk—and a rubber tube. You certainly made a mistake, though you do stand so high in moving picture comedy.

Ah, well, the best of men make mistakes sometimes—even I, the vinegar souled Tadpole.

Letters of an Old Exhibitor to a New Film Maker

Third Installment.

Saratoga Springs, 1911.

My dear ———: As I stay here longer, the place begins to weave its spell about me. No wonder that even far back in the twilight of Indian history the red men showed their love for some white brother by bringing him to this place. It certainly is "different." It shows me more clearly than ever before, that the best of all studios is Nature. Do not stick too close to your indoor or outdoor annex studio. We exhibitors, in the course of time, become as familiar with film makers' studios as with our own backyards. The public does not realize it as exactly as we do, but they feel the repetition after a while and it adds nothing to the merit of the moving picture entertainment. A studio will only go round for a certain number of pictures and then with slight variations it begins all over again. This is true even where the outdoor annex is of generous size. Go out into Nature just as often as you can. That is a charm of the photoplay, which the theater can never hope to rival. There is a specialty that can hardly be overlooked.

Being on the subject of specialties, it is well not to get into a rut. You film makers, like the poets, have dominion over the whole earth and whatever is below and above it. Vary your productions with an invariable degree of excellence. It is better to have the exhibitor say: "The ——— Company make a success of everything they touch," than have him say: "The ——— Company is all right for farce comedy, but otherwise they are not in the running." With the present cry for clean comedy, a little away from broad farce and clownish horseplay why not have your literary or dramatic head man take a dip into Molière. There's a rich mine. It must be worked with skill though and with a due allowance for the difference between Gallic and American humor. However, much of Molière's humor is universal and can easily be adapted for the American silent comedy. If you have the right materials among your players, try the "School for Wives" in any good translation, the original of course being always preferred. It may at first appear to be lacking in action, but it really is full of it, if you have competent artists to bring it out.

Expression, you know, is sometimes action of the subtlest but most attractive kind, especially in comedy of a finer order. I took the book into the park the other morning and spent an hour analyzing and re-analyzing and the more I studied it the better it seemed to me. And when you have made one successful adaptation, you will soon make others out of this classic author's works. I am writing this before breakfast—seems incredible, doesn't it for a man who never used to get up before the glare of the noonday sun was well abroad.

Well, this is going to be an exceptional breakfast, my poor, dear, sweltering film concocter. As soon as I am through with this I stroll through the Italian garden of Canfield's old clubhouse and pick my own individual speckled beauty out of a crystal pond. A menial catches it in my presence and then not caring to witness the details of the execution I walk into the club restaurant and a few minutes later I renew acquaintance with the speckled beauty converted into broiled trout. I dare not in addition give you a full list of the trimmings, there's a limit. So long.

GREEVER INSTALLS WURLITZER ORCHESTRA.

H. K. Greever, of Vernon, Texas, proprietor of Dreamland picture theater, has installed a Wurlitzer Automatic Orchestra. In announcing the innovation the Vernon Record congratulates Mr. Greever upon his enterprise and says among other things: "In all West Texas there is, perhaps, not a better equipped picture show than the Dreamland."

Mr. Maxwell H. Hite, the well-known electrician and moving picture expert of Harrisburg, Pa., gave a cinematograph exhibition free of charge recently to the patients of the hospital at Mt. Alto, Pa. A second exhibition was given by him for the benefit of the inmates of the County Home. These evenings proved to be delightful ones for the unfortunates. The sight of the pleasure they derived from the throughful generosity of Mr. Hite was pay enough for him.

A number of guests of Mr. and Mrs. John W. Early, steward and matron respectively of the County Home, witnessed the pictures and pronounced them among the best they had ever seen. Mr. Hite will give free picture shows once a month at the County Home.

A Parallel and a Prediction.

By Epes Winthrop Sargent.

Suppose—if you can think such foolish things—that Charles Frohman and the Empire Amusement Company, perhaps better known as the Western Wheel of Burlesque, should come to some understanding whereby Miss Maude Adams, in Chantecler, should replace the burlesque shows at Miner's Bowery Theater, while Billy Watson's "Beef Trust" held the boards at the Empire Theater, on Broadway, and John Drew followed "The Lady Buccaneers" over a prescribed route. How long would it be before some heir expectant sought the appointment of a commission in lunacy to determine the business competency of the parties to the agreement?

Such a combination would be unheard of, and yet the photoplays which divert the audiences in the theater on the Broadway block above the Empire are precisely the same as those which are shown a Bowery block below the Miner house. The same photoplays are to be found a few blocks to the east, where the signs are all in Hebrew characters and the translation of the title is pasted below the roman lettering of the A. B. C. posters, or a block west where Italian is practically the language of the street.

Speak of it to the photoplay enthusiast and he will tell you that it is the proof of the educational value of the photoplay; that is only another evidence of the universality of the picture drama.

That's what they all say—but is it true? Is it in accordance with the facts?

For the sake of argument let it be admitted that the East Side Hebrew supports a higher standard of drama than is always to be found on Broadway. This is not always correct, but it is broadly truthful. The fact stands, then, that the Hebrew is capable of appreciating the niceties of the highbrow film. Then why give as his program the revamped melodrama that possesses neither literary quality nor educational value? If the Hebrew wants the high-grade stuff why make him come to see two cowboy films and a cheap comedy?

But the Italian does not want the dramatic uplift. His blood is hot and passionate. He wants strong meat; faithless wives who are butchered, daring outlaws and the broad comedies that verge on farce. The censors will not permit the bloodthirsty drama, but why ask Giovanni or Pietro to sit through two reels of Enoch Arden when he would much prefer some of the vivid cowboy stuff that is the best substitute for the stuff he really wants?

Uptown the polite drama and comedy has the call. The little heart tug plays and the courteous comedy is in demand. There, the cowboy-play with one foot of plot and 950 feet of horseback riding is not approved. Why ask the man uptown to get interested in the cowboy?

Charles Frohman does not insist that the patrons of his Empire shall divide their interest between Ethel Barrymore and the star of the Rialto Rounders. Thomas Miner does not pull off his burlesque shows to make room for the problem play, and the home of musical comedy fares poorly when emergency demands that a serious drama be made the bill.

Why then should the photoplay theater be made the catch-all for all sorts and conditions of films? The answer seems to be that the photoplay theater is very much like a vaudeville house where any form of attraction may be played. That sounds like a reasonable, logical answer, but is it?

Percy G. Williams does not cater to the same style of audiences as do Keith and Proctor at their Fifth Avenue Theater and the Keith audiences in Boston and Philadelphia are unlike either of the New York clienteles or each other. They are all vaudeville houses, but the act that makes the hit of the bill in Boston may go dead in Philadelphia and meet with lukewarm success in the Williams houses in New York while "killing 'em" at the Fifth Avenue.

In the days of vaudeville sanity, before prosperity was made sacrifice to the association of vaudeville managers, each house manager booked his own show to suit the tastes of the patrons of his particular theater. When the blanket contract came and the acts played all houses the old audience drifted away to be replaced by others less discriminating.

So even the "vaudeville" plea does not hold, for it can be shown that even in vaudeville, where "everything goes," not all acts go with equal speed in all houses. Why then should it be argued that all pictures must go equally well in all photoplay theaters? And if they do not, why should not some change be effected whereby a manager may be permitted to cater to the tastes of his audience?

The booking system as it exists today in both the Licensed and Independent camps is a monstrosity in the eyes of the theatrical expert. It is a relic of barbarism, due to the unfamiliarity of the manufacturers with theatrical conditions. There is no branch of the amusement business where the percentage of trained showmen is so small, and the system of release and booking is the reflex of the unintelligence as to things theatrical.

For the manufacturer the simple plan of release is the most convenient to him, and therefore the best. To the exchange man the arbitrary program is the most convenient, and therefore the best, but to the experienced exhibitor, who sees his business slipping from him as a result of archaic methods, the condition is maddening. Of course archaic in connection with a business of but sixteen years' establishment is an exaggeration, but the booking system dates back to the time when there were few showmen among the managers of photoplay theaters, when the butcher, the baker or the candlestick maker could fit up a store, call it a theater and coin money. Then anything and everything went. The manager did not know what he wanted and at times he was almost intelligent enough to know that he did not know. He took what he could get and was thankful.

Now the exhibitor has learned and to the extent of his learning he sorrows. The arbitrary program is a sword that cuts both ways. It breaks down the business of the ghetto theater and destroys the patronage in the wealthy residential section alike. That business keeps approximately to the mark is due to the numbers of persons attracted to the pictures for a time and who are replaced by others when they drop out disgusted. When the supply of recruits gives out, the bottom of the business will drop out. That is what the intelligent observer is looking forward to.

The man of affairs who drops around to the photoplay theater with the family because he wants relaxation, and the dramatic theaters are too far downtown, is charmed with a program, and returns in a night or two to find another as good. He is more than ever delighted and neglects to purchase the seats for the Broadway success he has been intending to see. The photoplays are plenty good enough for him, he decides. He is through with the long ride home in the crowded cars. Contentedly he settles himself into his seat, but soon he straightens up. On the screen is a photoplay that barely passed the Censorship. It is crude, sordid and gory. It is followed by a farce that he is sorry the children will see and this, in turn, is replaced by a cowboy picture that is raw and bleeding with its elementary actions and still more elementary story. He stamps out of the house, with the family trailing at his heels, and not even the announcement of some triumph of photographic art will coax him into the house again. He has been bitten once.

Perhaps some other family is attracted by the announcement of some notable production and they sit enthralled by the vivid acting of notable players and the concise unfolding of some literary gem. There is a moment of delay and while they still are enjoying the retrospect of the vanished story there comes upon the screen some cheap farce, poorly acted, worse planned to completely nullify the effect of all that has gone before. Can the manager be blamed for cursing the exchange and lamenting his ill luck?

Take the other side of the situation. Here is a house in the poorer section of the town where the cowboy and the crude dramas are welcomed as art and the visualized poetry is voted dull. A succession of productions will draw big business, but they will drive from the house the former patrons just as a return to the old style films will result in the deflection of the newly gained patronage.

With from twenty to forty new subjects a week it should be possible to give all classes of patrons precisely what they desire; to offer well balanced, intelligently planned bills that will cater to the demand for artistry or mere action as the case may be.

It is very true, as the exchange man points out, that a lot of managers do not know what they want and demand this film or that, merely to make a pretense of management, but, on the other hand, there are scores of men, working for the uplift of the business by which they gain their livelihood, who are bound hand and foot by the rigid rules of the exchange, and whose efforts go for naught because they are compelled to take precisely what their patrons do not want, while they are refused what they desire.

It is time that the booking business was rearranged; that some plan be evolved whereby photoplays may be booked into the houses best suited to that style of production precisely as the dramatic attractions are routed. Burlesque and Ibsen do no belong on the same screen any more than they belong on the same stage. It is time that the artistic divorce was accomplished. It means an upheaval of business methods, it is true, but that will be better than no business at all, and unless the photoplay is classified, and distributed according to its class, there will come a time of depression in the business from which the purely amusement feature will but slowly recover, if at all.

The motion picture will endure as an educator, but it cannot live as an entertainer unless there is some recognition given the varying phases. The savant does not include dime novels in his reading nor does the messenger boy become engrossed in Darwin on the "Origin of Species." Why ask the photoplay-goer to accept anything and everything that may be filmed?

In a word, why ask the impossible?

THE PRINCESS THEATER, DENVER.

Denver can boast of her picture theaters as being entitled to stand in the very first rank of those in America. The Princess, a cut of which appears with this article, is a large and beautiful structure that seats 1,800 people. The following article, which appeared in the Denver Post, shortly after the opening of the theater, gives a description of the structure, its cost, details of the management, programs, etc.:

"After five months of construction, in which difficulties that seemed well nigh insurmountable were conquered, the Princess Theater, Denver's newest and best equipped moving picture playhouse, was opened on Tuesday, October 11, 1910. That it was filled within fifteen minutes after the doors were thrown open, and that each subsequent performance has been a repetition of the success of the first, proves that Denver appreciates comfort, luxury and art when combined in a theater, and will patronize performances in which artistic skill and mechanical perfection are merged with music that is in keeping with the tasteful decorations and elaborate appointments.

"The new playhouse is owned by the Princess Amusement Company, of which George C. Moore is president, George H. Greaves, secretary and manager, and A. P. Mackey, treasurer. These gentlemen have equipped the house at a cost of more than $125,000 and it is their boast that it excels any similar place of amusement in America. Messrs. Moore and Greaves have had many years' experience in catering to the amusement-loving public, and this experience stood them in good part when they made a tour of the motion picture theaters of the entire country in search of ideas to be incorporated into this enterprise.

"Not strangers to Denver are these two men, for they made their advent here four years ago when they opened what proved to be the first successful moving picture theater in the city. That was on the site of the former home of the Denver Post. Since then they have enlarged their sphere, inaugurating similar amusement places in many towns in the mountains and the experience gained in these enterprises has aided their efforts to make the Princess the leading house of its kind in the world. Older men in the amusement world ridiculed the contention that money could be made from the artistic presentation of motion pictures for a five cent admission fee, but the success of Messrs. Moore and Greaves has demonstrated the fallacy of this theory.

"In striving for architectural effect, the designer of the Princess Theater, Mr. Harry Edbrooke, made no sacrifice of the convenience or comfort of its patrons. On the contrary, he seemed to have had these points in view at all times, and the result is that he has produced a playhouse that will appeal to the material as well as to the artistic sensibilities of the audience. Entering by a commodious rotunda, the patron passes through a handsome arch, before which a small fountain, illuminated by electricity, splashes its crystal spray into a marble bowl. Cerise portieres of heavy plush separate the auditorium from the lobby and harmonize with the green tint of the walls and the dark covering of the wide and comfortable seats.

"One of the attributes of the house that strikes the visitor forcibly is the clean, healthy atmosphere that prevails. This is brought about by the use of an automatic ventilating device which pumps cold air in from near the roof, and forces out the foul air through an opening at the lower part of the pit, and changes the entire atmosphere every sixty seconds. The building is absolutely fireproof. There are no posts under the balcony. Every seat in the house is a good one. There is nothing to obstruct the view of the stage. The neat appearance of the employees, their courteous behavior and the scrupulous cleanliness of the house are impressive, and the fact that the management is committed to the policy of retaining these features guarantee the pleasure of those who visit the theater.

"Mr. Greaves is a believer in good music as an accompaniment to the picture drama, and he has spared no expense in obtaining an organization—the Biehl Ladies' Symphony Orchestra—that thoroughly meets his ideals. Each member of this orchestra is an artist, and from time to time each will perform a solo in place of the usual illustrated songs which are interspersed with the pictures.

"Mr. Tomkins, Denver's favorite tenor, has been engaged to sing at every evening performance, and his songs thus far have been one of the features which have gone far toward making the Princess a favored resort for those who love good music well rendered."

LYCEUM THEATER, MONROE, LA.

On July 9th, the Lyceum Theater, located at Monroe, La., was sold by the Pearce Enterprise, of New Orleans, to M. W. Hoyt, of Chicago, and W. L. Jennings, of New Orleans, for a consideration of $30,000. The Lyceum has a seating capacity of 500.

The equipment of the Lyceum throughout is first-class. A three-piece orchestra, which plays at the matinee and evening performances, is one of its chief assets. Licensed films are used, four reels daily. Two Edison exhibition machines are used, and two first-class operators are in charge of the operating room. The house is well ventilated, and cooled with two large exhaust and six large ceiling fans.

Mr. W. L. Jennings, under whose management the house is operated, is an old head in the managerial business, having been connected with the Orpheum Circuit Company in that capacity for a number of years. Though the Lyceum has a large and fully equipped stage, Mr. Jennings wishes it understood that straight pictures are the order of the day, and that at no time will he run vaudeville acts of any kind.

NEW THEATER FOR MILWAUKEE, WIS.

The Borum & Goldstein Amusement Company, a new corporation which was formed at Milwaukee, Wis., recently with offices at 522 East Water Street, has purchased a lot on North Avenue and 14th Street, and will erect a large and beautiful moving picture and vaudeville theater upon the site. The size of the house will be 50 by 151 feet. It will have eight exits and a seating capacity of 1,200, 400 being in boxes and loges. The prices of admission will be five and ten cents. Mr. Louis B. Goldstein, an experienced theater manager, will run the house. The opening date is set for October 1, 1911.

Music for the Picture

By CLARENCE E. SINN

EVERY pianist probably has some distinctive method or system he or she follows in "laying out" a picture. Some will work it up as well as possible at first sight and add any improving touches which may occur to them at each following show. Others will play anything or everything for the first show, meanwhile watching the picture closely to get an idea of the music most suitable. I have no comments to make either way so long as results are satisfactory; I mention this matter for the reason that I have been informed that I have done an injustice to a conscientious performer who evidently works according to the last named method (referred to last as "Harvard III"). I probably got in to see the first show, but I am informed on good authority that the pianist in question plays "to the pictures." In that case I wish I had waited to see the next show. Anyhow, I would rather "boost" than find fault.

It is so easy to criticize and so hard to always think of just the right thing to play. This is especially true when accompanying the picture at "first sight," as someone puts it. How often a scene will develop in a manner entirely different from what you are led to expect, and you find your music leading up to the denouement to be entirely out of keeping. Of course dramatic surprises are necessary to a good story, and I am not referring to these. What I have in mind is the difficulty of recognizing the nature of a play at its very beginning and the consequent perplexity of "opening" the picture correctly. Very often the music will (or should) indicate the nature of a picture before the action progresses far enough to do so. "What is this picture supposed to be—a comedy?" "I don't know; play a waltz till we find out." We've all been through that experience and most of us are still going through it. So the fellow who simply watches the show the first time and "works it up" afterward has reason on his side.

O. J. H. wants to know what to play for "Christian and Moor" (Edison). I have not a clear recollection of the details of this picture, but Mr. King's orchestra used the "Moorish Parade" to open the play—I believe it ran through the first two scenes. Then "Egyptian Love Dance" (by Pryor), till the rival lover appears. After that I believe follows the "Story of the Cross" when "The Rosary" was played. The rest was straight "dramatic" music—hurries, agitatos, plaintives, etc. I am sorry I have not a complete synopsis of this music, but this may help some. I shall offer suggestions for appropriate music to coming releases whenever I can find it practical to do so, but heretofore this has been done more with the view of illustrating some point than anything else.

"The Death of King Edward III" (Vitagraph) is accompanied by plaintive music throughout. "Melody in F," "Traumerei," "Muskowski's Serenade," "Simple Aveau" and things on that order until the king takes the bible; then "The Rosary" (or some religioso), till close.

A correspondent from Texas contemplates installing a pipe organ in his theater, but before making the venture he desires a few pointers. As I am not in a position to offer him any practical information on the subject perhaps someone who has given this kind of music a trial will not be averse to helping our neighbor out. Tell us what in your opinion is the most satisfactory in regard to size, number of manuals, etc. Is it best to use the pipe organ exclusively, or in conjunction with the piano? Does it "wear" so well with your patrons as other kinds of music? And maybe someone could give an idea as to the probable salary an organist would expect to go down to Texas. (Anything in this line will be treated confidentially, and the letters forwarded to the manager in question.)

Mrs. G. L. (Washington) says: "I extemporize a great deal and am told I do well, but I find it more satisfactory not to depend altogether upon extemporaneous playing in working up the picture. I have a fair little library—not large, but carefully selected—and memorize some of those numbers which are demanded most frequently. Others I have only partly committed to memory, but am familiar enough with them to watch the picture with an occasional glance at the music. I am constantly adding to my library and make it a point to practice my music at home instead of at the theatre, and in this way am enabled to give my attention to the pictures. I encountered and overcame one difficulty which I want to tell you about, as it may prove as useful to someone else as it has to me. I found it hard to think quickly of appropriate music for some of the pictures at times. Usually if I took time to look through my stack of music I could find something which would answer the purpose or be just the thing wanted, but that took too long; rather than do that I would 'fake' something. Well, I got tired of 'faking' so much when I knew I had good and appropriate stuff if I only could think of it quick enough, so made a help to the memory in the shape of an index. First I took all my dramatic music and cut out each number, pasted it on a sheet and numbered it. (I borrowed this idea from your 'Orpheum Collection' of dramatic music.) I have a great deal of this kind of music and find the separate sheet idea for each number is good. Also I can number and index separately the "hurry's, mysterious, agitato's, plaintives, etc.," and find them readily. My other music I divide under the following heads: 'Straight marches, rag marches, march intermezzo, grand marches, military marches, medley (popular) waltzes, plain waltzes, concert waltzes and waltz lento. Barn dance and 'Rube' characteristic. Gavotte, polonaise and minuet. Intermezzo-characteristic (such as Martenique, etc.). Novelettes (this includes such numbers as 'Laces and Graces,' etc.). Sentimental and pathetic ('Heartsease,' etc.). These are often so near alike that it is hard to classify them separately.

'National music' I keep by itself. It includes everything which might be useful in giving 'local color,' from 'Suwanee River' to 'Die Wacht am Rhein.' I also keep Oriental, American Indian and Spanish waltzes under this heading. Many numbers, like the Spanish waltz, for instance, may be, listed under two different heads. (This would be among waltzes and 'National music,' too.) 'Miscellaneous' includes anything and everything which cannot be classified under the other headings. These are all numbered and catalogued in a little book which I keep in a convenient place, and whenever I am in doubt about any particular number it only takes a few seconds to find something to fit—if I have it. If not, of course I have to invent something, but I can usually find something which will answer very nicely. I generally call upon my library when the scenes are long enough to admit of a well developed theme. Where they are very short or quick changing, I follow the picture with improvised music; that is the better way to my mind, as one can thus follow the movements of the characters. I also improvise in going from one number to another especially if they differ in character—such for example as changing from a waltz to a hurry."

Your method of indexing is almost identical with the method in use by Mr. King, of the Orpheum Theatre, Chicago. In fact, it was there I got the idea of publishing dramatic music on separate sheets as exemplified in the "Orpheum Collection." As to your handy book of reference, I can testify to its efficiency from my own experience. It is certainly an aid to the memory sometimes.

Wisconsin says: "What wo ld you play for such pictures as 'The Stolen Dog,' 'That Dare Devil,' etc.?"

Both are lively comedies and the music should be kept lively all through. Occasionally in this kind of picture a popular song chorus can be introduced with good effect. If these are difficult to call to mind, why not borrow an idea from the letter quoted above and make a list of all the songs you can play without music and keep the list in a convenient place. A reference to it might often suggest something appropriate which would not have been thought of otherwise.

Projection Department

Edited by F. H. RICHARDSON

How About It?—A letter signed "San Francisco Operators," written on stationery of Motion Picture Operators' Union No. 162, reads as follows: "Concerning the sketch of operating room, by Mr. Cristiani, Washington, D. C. (P. 206, July 29 issue), there has been animated discussion in this office as to probable use of the umbrella, shown in one corner of the room, or, in this case, house would probably be the proper term. It has been suggested that, inasmuch as the umbrella is shown installed close to the fire extinguisher, it is to keep water off the operator when the latter is used. In your opinion, is the use of an umbrella advisable in case of rainy films? Please ask Mr. Cristiani to set us right in this matter, thus relieving the intense anxiety and suspense which hangs over us like a pall. As we write, a new suggestion has been made, viz., that the complexion protector is used to catch the smoke from any fire which might occur."

As to the advisability of using an umbrella in case of rainy film, I would not approve of it. A club would be more effective, same to be administered in allopathic doses to the man supplying the film. I have seen some film in which a circus tent would be required to protect the actors. Possibly Brother Cristiani uses the parasol to protect himself from the flow of language emanating from the manager, when things go wrong. Maybe he opens and shuts it rapidly in lieu of a fan or uses it the same way in starting the fire in the arc lamp. It is also permissible to suppose the roof leaks. We might assume it is used in conducting his best girl home after the show on rainy nights, or that it is hoisted as a protection to the audience during inclement weather. Personally, I am inclined to the opinion that the artist forgot it was there until the picture was done and then left it to show the admiring world that Washington operators' salaries are such that he is able to own one. But, after all, we can merely conjecture. May I add my pleas to that of San Francisco that Neighbor Cristiani come forward promptly and relieve this terrible uncertainty?

Excellent Management.—In Bath Beach, Brooklyn, is a theatre manager deserving of more than passing notice. Mr. A. Michelson, who manages the Plaza Theatre and airdome, is the man. As manager he surely is the real thing. Mr. Michelson knows good projection when he sees it. He demands it, too. The operator who is able to satisfy him is entitled to print on his cards the legend, "Capable and Careful Operator." There are those who call Mr. Michelson a "crank." He is nothing of the sort. He merely knows good projection when he sees it, and proposes to have it. He is having plans prepared and intends constructing a summer-winter theatre, seating 1,000, along the lines suggested by the editor of this department on page 122, July 22 issue. Mr. Michelson is a successful manager, but has earned his success by working hard and along intelligent lines.

Curtain Coating.—Lakewood, N. J., writes: "We tried the formula for curtain coating supplied by California, page 1311, June 10 issue, and like the screen better than the silverine screen, as it is brighter. However, we find that the seams where the cloth is sewed together show like railroad tracks. They ofttimes come right down through one of the characters and literally cut them in two. The screen seems more bright and silvery in one spot in the center. Can you suggest anything to cover up the seams? Of these there are five."

I cannot. Let it be clearly understood that the formulas we have printed in no sense have the indorsement of this department. We have published them merely as letters from subscribrs, without personally knowing anything concerning their value. I believe this has been clearly understood by all. If the seam shows, that settles it, I think. While it is possible, the coating of a screen with aluminum so as to give good results is an extremely difficult matter. There are some screens on the market from which excellent reports have come (see letter from Chicago in another place). The editor has not examined them, however, and he has never yet given aything his personal recommendation without having first-hand knowledge concerning it. If the manufacturers of the patent screens see fit to send samples of their product, or so arrange that I may see their screen in practical use, well and good. Otherwise I cannot recommend their product. When recipes are published in this department it means that you may try them if you wish, but entirely as an experiment, at your own risk. It must be understood that, while one man may be pleased with a curtain coating, it does not necessarily mean that it does not contain faults. In view of the fact that there is so very much uncertainty regarding curtain coating formulas, we have decided to not publish any more of them. We are further inclined to this course by reason of the fact that there now appears to be, if reports are to be relied upon, some really excellent screens on the market.

You, friends, who have submitted formulas need not rush to the defense of your recipes. No doubt you believe them most excellent. Possibly they are, too, in your hands. It does not follow, however, that they will be in the hands of someone else. We have carefully considered this matter and have come to the conclusion that publication of curtain formulas does as much or more harm than good.

Book Wanted.—Brooklyn, N. Y., writes: "Would you kindly advise me as to some good work on electricity to study, prior to taking examination for license?"

Sorry, Brooklyn, but I know of no such book, unless it be one of the text-books of the International Correspondence School, and they are pretty difficult to get hold of unless you are a student of the school. The information on electricity necessary to the operator is scattered through many books. The editor of this department has purchased an entire book on electricity to get the matter contained on just one page. One trouble, too, is that the so-called elemental books are altogether too elemental to be of much practical value, while the more advanced works are couched in language difficult for the beginner to comprehend, and they mostly treat on one or two main subjects, dealing with others but very briefly, and contain little of value as to operating room practice, rheostatic resistance and the things the operator particularly wants to thoroughly understand. You will probably get more real operating information out of my own handbook than from any other one book. At least what is therein contained is practical and is written in language you can understand. It may be had of the Moving Picture World, postpaid, for $1.50.

It Does.—New York City writes: "Am an old New York operator. Took examination about two months ago and failed. Was notified that I could be re-examined in ninety days. Now, does that mean that, with the new law in force, I will come under the six months' apprenticeship clause? I held a New York license from 1907 to 1910. The citizen law made me lose it. Am working in Jersey now. Must I actually work in New York six months as helper, or is there some way out of it if I have a Jersey license?"

The law is quoted in another place this week, with comments thereon. You will see just what you are up against if it is enforced. Your statements do not coincide, however, You say that citizenship law caused you to lose your license and you also say you failed to pass satisfactory examination. Which is right?

Tension.—Princeton, N. J., writes: "Am running an Edison Type B machine and have considerable trouble losing lower loop. This occurs during the first part of the run, due I suppose, to the greater strain on the film when the lower film roll is small. I manage to avoid same by raising weight arm slightly, thus slacking the take-up belt. Taking the hint from a letter in the department, some time ago, I intend to install a foot pedal to raise the weight arm. Will run a cord from pedal to pulley at ceiling and back to arm. On page 204, July 29 issue, you say: 'Sixty amperes X thirty-five volts (A C arc voltage) equal 2,100 watts, which divided by 200, the line voltage equals about ten amperes, same being the pull from the line through an inductor or economizer.' Do the same figures apply when working with a rheostat? Could I fuse up with fifteen ampere fuses and pull fifty amperes at the arc? Perhaps I ought to know all this, but I don't. However, I can never learn younger."

No doubt the foot pedal idea will work out to your satisfaction. If I rightly remember some correspondent suggested what I thought a still better scheme, viz.: he placed an ordinary knife switch on the wall over the weight arm, clamped the blade so that it moved pretty stiff (stiff enough to hold the weight) and attached a cord from top of switch blade to weight. By merely moving the switch blade he raised or lowered the weight, thus tightening or loosening the take-up belt. No, the same thing by no manner of means applies to the rheostat. That is precisely the reason a low voltage transformer (economizor or inductor) saves money compared with a rheostat. It wastes next to nothing, while the rheostat consumes, in the form of heat, the difference between the line and arc voltage. Therefore the wattage at the arc is much less than that taken from the line, though the amperage is the same, the difference being dissipated in the form of heat by the rheostat. In other words, if you wish fifty amperes at the arc when using a rheostat, you must take fifty from the line, but it will be at a pressure of 110 volts (or whatever it may be) when taken from the line and at about thirty-five, if A C, at the arc.

Address Wanted.—The editor would like the address of an old friend, Mr. W. R. Cozart, last heard of in New Mexico. He was formerly a Chicago exhibitor. If anyone knows where Mr. Cozart is they will confer a favor by communicating the information.

Machine Tables.—Savannah, Ga., writes: "We are contemplating the installation of two new machines. Would you advise the use of the tables having telescopic legs or what sort of setting would you recommend?"

The telescopic leg tables serve the purpose very well, provided the legs be of heavy material, an inch and a quarter in diameter, and further provided that the table be well and firmly anchored down. The best anchor is quarter-inch rods of iron with turn-buckles in their middle. The ideal machine mount, however, is a concrete or brick pier, the size and shape of the table. If brick is used they ought to be laid in rich cement mortar, suitable anchor bolts for the machine table being embedded as the pier is built. The top of the pier should then be covered with a coat of ordinary, rather stiff mortar and the machine table laid on it, and the lamp being temporarily connected, the table carefully pulled down with the anchor bolts until the light is exactly right on the screen. Trim off the mortar neatly at the sides and carefully remove the table, if it be of wood, until the mortar is dry, when it may be replaced and securely bolted down. The outer course, if it is a brick pier, should be of pressed brick, or better still, white enameled, with round-nose brick for the corners. Such a pier will be solid, have no vibration, and be in every way excellent. If it be laid on a floor it will be well to run two anchor bolts, one near each end, through the floor, long enough to reach half-way up the height of the pier, building up around them, and when the top is nearly reached put on an iron plate one-fourth to three-eights of an inch thick by five inches square, clamping same down with a nut. If you object to a solid pier, two square ones, one at each end, will do, provided they be secured with stout anchor bolts as above. A concrete pier is easier to construct, and, except that it is not so handsome in appearance, is just as good. It has the advantage that the machine table can be placed in exactly the right position on a temporary box built to serve as a mould for the concrete, the table anchor bolts hung in place and the concrete poured in until the box is full, the whole being left until the mixture sets, when the boxing when removed the job is done. This does not, of course, apply to the machines built to operate only on a certain kind of table. If a magazine under the table is desired, space for same can easily be provided, especially in the concrete pier. To get high-class projection it is absolutely essential that the machine be held perfectly rigid, without a particle of vibration. This is too seldom accomplished, and the result shows on the screen, particularly on long throws.

Condensers.—New Castle, Wyoming, writes: "Well, I am back home, operating a new Powers 6 for the Orpheum. When last I wrote was on the road with a traveling concert band. Is it correct to place the large condenser next the arc and the small one next the machine?"

You are a little twisted, New Castle. By "large" and "small" I presume thick and thin—short and long focal length is what you really mean. I would place them the other way. The optical effect will, I think, be the same, since it is the EF of the combination that counts, and the thinner lens is a little less likely to break from heat. Address of paper has been changed as per your request.

Thorough Examination.—Boston, Mass., writes: "Replying to 'Citizenship,' page 374, August 12 issue, will say that it is not necessary to be a citizen to get license in this State. The examination fee is $3.00, payable at time of filing of application, and applicants must be residents of the State. The examination is probably the hardest in the country and lasts from two to three hours. It is necessary that the applicant be a fairly good electrician, since the examination covers the lighting subject pretty thoroughly, particularly the three-wire system. They also make you connect all your operating circuit up to the machine, starting from large switchboard having all connections concealed behind the board. As there are several dummy fuses, it is necessary to test. They also oblige you to get a clear, white light on the screen before running picture, and will keep you at it if there is the slightest shadow visible. With regard to the union: the initiation fee is $50, and applicants must have worked eight months in the State before being admitted, unless transferred from another local. In conclusion will say that the projection is generally good and it is useless for an operator who cannot maintain a good, clear picture to try to secure work here. I state these things clearly, not to discourage anyone from coming here, since salaries are good, but to let correspondents understand the conditions clearly before expending time and money only to meet disappointment. I will add that the State police keep applicants waiting about two weeks after application is filed. In case of failure to pass, an appeal is allowed, after which one must wait ninety days before another application can be filed, accompanied by another $3.00 fee. The union controls all houses in Boston and about ninety per cent. of those in the State. Will be glad to furnish additional information at any time."

We are indebted to you, Boston, for the information so well set forth. It is a thing the union itself ought to have done for the benefit of all. As you say, it will doubtless save many a poor fellow time and money, to say nothing of disappointment. The writer is pleased to know that the Boston examination is so thorough. That is as it should be. However, I do not agree with the proposition that an applicant must be a citizen of the State. I hold to the broad principle that a man has the right to labor no matter what State he is a citizen of, so long as he complies with local union requirements and is able to prove his capabilities. I am of the opinion that such laws would be declared unconstitutional and against public policy by the United States courts were it brought to test. If the principle holds good then New York State, for instance, could forbid anyone to labor within her boundaries until they had resided here one year. Rather an absurd proposition, isn't it? In such a matter can you single out a motion picture operator and apply a State citizenship law to him? Hardly! Beyond this I have no criticism to offer on the conditions set forth in your letter.

The Other Side.—Spokane, Wash., writes: "I take the liberty of writing for the reason that I am an old student of your teachings and a constant reader of the department; also I still have one of those little handbooks you published years ago. In August 5 issue, Local 235, I. B. E. W. seems to have given voice to a complaint concerning L. U. 185, I. A. T. S. E. Well, brother, I certainly agree with you when you say that they are both great and grand organizations and have both done splendid work in their respective fields. Also, as you say, there is enough for us to do in perfecting the art of projection and improving conditions under which operators work, but, for the benefit of some who may not understand conditions here, I will set forth a few facts. The I. A. T. S. E. have been chartered since April 1, 1908, as an operators' union; first as No. 139, later as No. 185. They are, and always have been, affiliated with the A. F. of L. On the other hand, No. 235 belong to what is known as the Reid-Murphy faction of the I. B. E. W. and have no such affiliation, but instead are fighting the A. F. of L. I am ashamed to say that the Spokane Central Council, affiliated with the A. F. of L., being at present controlled by the above-named faction, favors the unaffiliated body, instead of the one affiliated."

I have published the above letter on the grounds that each side is entitled to a hearing. I am more than sorry to learn of the trouble and sincerely trust it will soon be settled It is not the wish of the editor to mix up in factional fights, the real merits of which he cannot possibly know at first hand; also the World, as a paper, cannot possibly do so, as you will readily understand. The writer was active in organized labor affairs from 1884 to 1903. He belonged longer than that and is now a member of the New York Operators' Union. He has seldom seen a factional fight in which the right or the wrong was all on one side. It is indeed sad to see the forces of labor engaged in factional scraps when every energy is needed for other and better purposes. This much may be said, however, and must be admitted by all: the A. F. of L. is the governing body and it has given charge of the operators into the hands of the I. A. T. S. E. The I. A. T. S. E. locals, therefore, must be recognized as official so long as conditions remain as they are. The writer has received many letters lately proposing the formation of an Operators' International Union. Whether anything will come of the movement I do not, of course, know.

Double Spot Remedy.—New York City writes: "Am a regular reader of the department and have received much benefit therefrom. Lately have noticed some brother operators have sought a remedy for the 'double spot.' Have had that trouble myself and did away with it by reducing the width of the collar which separates the two condensing lenses. My lenses are half an inch apart and I get a clear, white, round spot. Your operating platform for a motor-driven machine (page 373, August 12 issue) is great, but you know 'necessity is the mother of invention.' When my best girl is downstairs smiling at me I might put a pail of sand on the platform and have the laugh on you after all."

My dear boy, you would have to get a pretty large pail to hold a hundred pounds of sand, and if you kept anything so heavy in the operating room you could not well hide it effectively. Mr. Inspector might possibly ask you to explain its presence, and you know I proposed attaching a penalty which would make the average man think several times before taking so big a chance. As to the double spot, reducing the collar would probably work in some cases, but not in all. However, we are obliged to you for the suggestion.

Shutter Not Set Right.—Hagerstown, Md., writes: "Am in trouble. When a character on the screen has on white clothes it shows streaked. Have set the shutter several times, but have not succeeded in getting it perfect. Am using an Edison one-pin machine, which has just been overhauled at the factory. Thinking the wing of the shutter was not wide enough, I fastened a piece of cardboard to the wing, increasing its width, but it did no good."

Your description of the effect is rather vague. I assume that you are troubled with a travel-ghost. You speak only of its affecting an actor in white clothes and speak as if the clothes themselves showed streaked. I presume, however, the streaked effect is on anything dark under or over any light object on the screen. If there are streaks up or down from letters of a black and white title, then it is a travel-ghost that is bothering you. If they are up from the letters your shutter is too late, if down too early and it must be moved accordingly. If the streaks show both ways from title letters at the same time, then the shutter blade is too narrow and must be made wider. If this does not fit, then you will have to be more concise in describing the effect. On pages 111 to 114, inclusive, of the handbook, you will find shutter setting explained in detail, and its principle explained also. If you haven't a copy I would advise you to get one as soon as you can.

The Evidence.—Many manufacturers of motion picture appliances take umbrage because we do not speak more flatteringly of their product. They seem to have imbibed the idea that the simple fact of their carrying an advertisement in our columns is all that is necessary to call forth an endorsement of the article without stint. Aside from his work on the paper the editor of this department has had, for more than three years, a large clientele of exhibitors, who, being unable to personally inspect all the various articles necessary in their business, consult him personally and depend on his judgment as to what is best. He has tried to give everybody concerned an absolutely square deal and that is precisely what the Moving Picture World itself wishes to do. It would be manifestly unwise, as well as verging on dishonesty, to recommend that which we have never seen and have no personal knowledge of, and that this paper will in no case do. It may allow what is known as a "write-up," but the recommendation of the paper, as well as the recommendation of the editor of this department, can and will only be given after careful, critical, personal examination of the article in question. It is therefore up to the manufacturers themselves. The Moving Picture World is the leading exponent of motion picture affairs in America. It has always been and always will be a conservative organ of the trade. Its recommendation is therefore of recognized value, and if manufacturers expect to receive either the personal approval of the editor of this department or of the paper itself, they must either supply samples of their product for examination or else provide ways and means whereby it may be seen and examined here in New York City. Valuable articles, such as machine heads, transformers, lenses, etc., can be returned to the owner. We do not want them, nor have we room in which to keep anything more than is absolutely necessary to our work, but we do want to inspect them and must if, as I have said, they are to have our personal approval. As a matter of fact, however, in view of the number of machine trouble questions propounded by the Projection Department readers there ought to be one machine head of each kind in this office at all times for reference.

Miss Turner, San Francisco, Calif., writes: "Kindly inform me whether or not Miss Florence Turner, of the Vitagraph Company, is dead, or what has happened to her. Our patrons are asking."

Not so you could notice it, Frisco. Miss Turner was quite ill for a time, but is back having her photygraf tuk at the rate of sixteen a second as of old. She is the liveliest "dead one" you ever gazed at, and we hope to be able to enjoy her splendid work for many years.

Oklahoma Operator.—If any Western exhibitor wishes an operator of seven years' experience, good references, I have the name of an Oklahoma man who wishes to change. Salary not less than $20 to start. Prefers to go further West.

High Wages, Benton Harbor, Mich., writes: "There is one operator in this little city who certainly is a peach. After burning up a reel of film in St. Joseph, Mich., he offered to work here for $4.00 per week. He got the job and the operator whose place he took is helping out the manager by keeping the machine in shape so that the $4.00 operator can run it. What do you think of that?"

Assuming that what you say is correct (though it sounds most absurd), I don't think anything of it at all. The man who cannot command more than $4.00 a week, or the manager who would employ him at that figure, is too insignificant to bother one's brains about. The operator who was ousted to make room for the four-dollar-a-week butcher is in pretty poor business, I should say, I am unalterably opposed to low wages for operators for the double reason that it is not just or right and it operates to degenerate projection, which ought instead to be made more perfect. But this is not a case of low wages. It is a case of a "manager" (?) attempting to secure projection for nothing. He will, of course, merely succeed in ruining his business, if he has any. As for the four-dollar-a-week genius, he isn't worth the typewriter ribbon that would be consumed in voicing my opinion of him. The correspondent gives name of operator, manager and theatre, but we cannot publish them, though they really ought to be given publicity.

Sunlight Screen.—Chicago, Ills., writes: "A word as to an article of genuine merit, viz.: The Sunlight Screen. This article has real merit. It is not, so the maker claims, an aluminum screen and most certainly it is not a surface-coated curtain. Of this I have convinced myself by cutting through the fabric, which is homogeneous, and, in my opinion, a thin muslin saturated with some sort of amalgam or aluminum preparation. It is much like a sheet of heavy tinfoil, as smooth in grain as a highly polished piece of steel, but with a matte surface, which gives a wonderfully soft effect to the projection. The picture is absolutely free from all glare and shadows such as are present with aluminum coated curtains. The Sunlight has been installed in many of Chicago's best houses, including all of the Jones, Linick & Schaeffer theatres and the Hyman Brothers' two new houses. It is a flexible screen, which can be rolled up in any way without the slightest injury to the fabric. There is one point I must not forget, and that is the patent frame they use, which stretches the screen as tight as a drum. This is an improvement, I think, on anything else on the market. The manufacturers tell me it takes twenty days to make a Sunlight curtain. I write this merely to give credit where credit is due and trust it will find space in the department."

If I did not know different, Chicago, I would suspect the above came from the makers of the Sunlight screen. However, I happen to know the writer has no connection with that company, so it is all right. My personal mail has contained a great many inquiries as to the Sunlight Screen. I have not, as yet, seen the screen, however, but am indeed pleased to know it meets your approval. Your recommendation certainly is strong, but the fact that the Jones, Linick & Schaeffer houses have installed them goes far to convince me it is justified. I am always glad to hear of anything tending to really improve projection. Some of these days I shall doubtless see a Sunlight screen delivering the goods and will then tell you my own opinion; also will have a big job of letter writing to attend to.

Constitutional.—The New York law, commented on last week, has been pronounced constitutional by the New York City Corporation Counsel. Look out for plenty of fun now!

Dr. Sherman Williams, president of the Board of Health in Denver, Col., has purchased several reels of the Pathe Freres moving picture dealing with the campaign on the fly and is inducing the proprietors of moving picture theaters to exhibit them.

TESTING THE NEW YORK OPERATORS' LAW.

About 100 moving picture operators are affected by the provisions of the new New York State law, chapter 252 of the laws of 1911, which provides that no license shall be issued to a moving picture operator unless he has registered his name and served a six months' apprenticeship with a licensed operator. Operators, so excluded, to the number of eighty, engaged John F. Bennett to test the constitutionality of the new statute and he prepared a test case naming Charles W. Paris, of No. 1159 Jackson Avenue, New York, as plaintiff, and Commissioner Thompson, of the Department of Water Supply, Gas and Electricity, as defendant.

The attorney wanted to get a peremptory writ of mandamus directed to Commissioner Thompson, compelling him to grant a license to Paris to operate a moving picture machine, and the matter came to the attention of Justice Ford in the Supreme Court on the petition of Paris, who stated that he had been engaged as an electrician about theaters for a number of years and for the past four years had been engaged in moving picture and theatrical enterprises. He had passed the necessary New York City examination and passed all the requirements, but was informed that no license would be issued to him until the corporation counsel had given an opinion in the interpretaton of the law as to the serving of an apprenticeship. Paris had not served the required six months with a licensed operator, but said that he had a New Jersey license.

When the matter came before Justice Ford, Assistant Corporation Counsel Hahlo told Justice Ford that he was willing to have the motion for a writ granted provided the justice found that in Paris' case the holding of the New Jersey license would cover the requirements of the New York statute.

"We don't want that," said Mr. Bennett. "We want to test the constitutionality of the new law."

Justice Ford suggested that the argument go over until the cooler weather, telling Mr. Bennett that he ought to be satisfied with the concession of the corporation counsel. Bennett finally consented to this and was given the writ which gives the license to Paris. At a future date he will prepare to fight the constitutionality of the law in behalf of the excluded operators.

THE LONGEST THROW IN THE WORLD.

212-Foot Projection at Young's Pier, Atlantic City, N. J.

A representative of the World called recently at Young's Pier at Atlantic City for the special purpose of looking over the moving picture part of the entertainment there. Instead of being incidental, it is quite plain to be seen that moving pictures form the principal attraction at Young's Pier, and all other amusements are comparative side issues. The pictures have the place of honor in the main pavilion or dance hall. Moving pictures and dancing are both going on at the same time. In this great pavilion, the vast assemblage in the balconies and rocking chairs sit at their ease and enjoy the moving picture, to the strains of music by a double brass band, or watching the dancers, according to their fancy.

Immediately upon entering the ball-room the World's representative was struck with the enormous length of the throw from picture machine to curtain, and he immediately determined to investigate. Applying at the manager's office, and knowing his name beforehand, the World scout inquired for Mr. T. Wister Grooket, manager of Young's Million-Dollar Pier. There is not very much of Mr. Grooket, physically, but he is a human storage battery of energy and quick intelligence. It was a distinct surprise to find one of such boyish appearance in full charge of so vast an enterprise as Young's Pier. It is the same surprise that people have upon meeting Frederic Thomson, the founder of Luna Park at Coney Island.

We made our way to the operating room, determined to find out all the inside facts about the longest throw in the world, for the projection distance from operating room to screen is exactly 212 feet. We did not find the exact back focus of the lens, but we do know that the lens sits in a lens barrel fourteen inches in length and three inches in diameter, especially made for that particular throw by the Bausch & Lomb factory at Rochester, N. Y. Prejecting its nose out of the operating room, the lens barrel resembles a small rapid-fire cannon protruding from the turret of a battleship, and apparently as formidable. The writer did not obtain the exact lens measurement, as the chief operator was off duty, and neither his helper nor Mr. Grooket were expert enough in optics to furnish the correct data.

The stereopticon lens sits at a distance of three feet from the nose of the lamp house on a bracket extending outside of the operating room. At the opposite end of the large hall is a Mirror Screen, 14 by 16 feet, upon which a picture in most perfect detail is to be seen. The light carried perfectly through this large dance hall which was in a semi-lighted condition; light enough for the dancers to recognize their friends, who were sitting out the dances, or to see the color of the eyes of whoever they were dancing with. Fifty amperes are required to get the proper light, using a three-quarter-inch carbon. For resistance there has been installed a new-fangled apparatus in the way of a motor generator, about the shape of an inverted frying pan of large size, with a row of buttons and a connecting lever. This apparatus is knoyn as the "Blancearc" and is very compact; so much so that one almost wonders how it can stand such heavy current. The machine used is an Edison 1911 model.

Mr. Grooket informed our man that moving pictures are the prime favorite at Young's Million-Dollar Pier. They are the principal attraction, and this is demonstrated conclusively on Sunday nights. There is no dancing allowed on Sundays and pictures exclusively are the drawing card. The large dance hall is filled with chairs and the native population of Atlantic City turns out for moving pictures only. On Sunday evenings eight reels of first and second run Licensed pictures are shown, and the natives are so fond of their pictures that they will not stand for any singing. Mr. Grooket says that the management went to considerable expense to import into this country Mr. Leonard Baker, the renowned English singer known as the Yorkshire Nightingale, but the people did not care to hear him. From their point of view he was simply interfering with the pictures, so the management thought it wiser to cancel his engagement.

We were given a large photograph of the Atlantic City dance hall, but do not reproduce it, as it does not do justice to the real magnitude of the place.

Score another point for the motion pictures. London publishers complain that the circulation of cheap literature has dropped from 400,000 to 100,000 owing to the opening of innumerable picture theaters. This inroad by the pictures should be gratifying. For a generation the effects of cheap, trashy publications upon the youthful mind have been a basis of much discussion.

Comments on the Films

Licensed.

"The Sorrowful Example" (Biograph).—Perhaps such films as this teach important truths, but they are not pleasant and so far as furnishing entertainment is concerned are nil. It is the story of a drunken husband who steals his wife's savings to elope with a girl. They miss the train and on their way back to wait for the next one find the wife's bloody apron and discover that she has fallen over a cliff. Just strength enough is left her to crawl back to the baby's crib where she falls dead beside it. The girl then spurns him and he is left to meditate upon his own worthlessness. The audience will wonder what becomes of the child now the mother is dead.

"In the Paris Slums" (Pathe).—There is a touch of old Roman days in the retrieving of the rose in this film. It is supposed to represent some phases of life in the Paris slums. Probably the principal interest will center around the return of the rose after the animal trainer has cast it into the den where her pets are kept. This reviewer cannot say that he thinks this picture is worthy the firm which produced it. It conveys erroneous impressions of life and recalls the cruelties of earlier days.

"Extracting Palm Juice in the Forest" (Pathe).—Excellent pictures of a forest with palms constituting the bulk of the scenery and the operation of securing the juice clearly portrayed. The novelty of the occupation will appeal to any audience. The juice is used as a drink after fermentation.

"Vienna, Austria" (Pathe).—A travelog giving a series of good views of this famous capital. Like all of Pathe's pictures of this sort it is clearly photographed and the viewpoints are chosen with the intention of giving a good impression of the city.

"The Winds of Fate" (Edison).—Perhaps the hero of this very well acted picture (a typical American life-portrayal) was a little careless, as even the most efficient are sometimes. He was a good business man and held a responsible position; but the wind blew a negotiable bond under a piece of office furniture and he was suspected anl discharged. The home scenes show him and his wife and son meeting the difficulty like real Americans. The rent is due and they need money badly. The winds blow the son's hat off and he picks it up just where a purse with much money in it is lying. The boy brings this home; but just then the winds blowing the newspaper show the boy's father an ad telling him that his old employer has lost the purse. The boy takes the purse to its owner, who is astonished to find whose son the boy is. He writes his address on a slip of paper and lays it just where the bond had been. The same draught blows the slip under the bookcase where the bond lies and both are brought out together. There seems to be many coincidences. When the boy's hat is being blown along the street, the trees are almost still.

"Captain Barnacle's Baby" (Vitagraph).—Habitués of the photoplay will be glad to know that though Captain Barnacle, after his unfortunate matrimonial experience, was so grumpy that even his old shipmate, that grand old salt, Captain Bunce, was afraid of him, he has now completely recovered his old spirits. He happened to rescue a bit of flotsam from the surf, a baby, and that has wakened him. The youngster will warm the hearts of photoplayers also and they should keep an eye on the films for the few weeks ensuing to see Captain Barnacle's baby. The story is well laid out. Captain Bunce's part in it is almost as amusing as his part in "Captain Barnacle's Courtship," a picture the Vitagraph people released last winter. There is one thing that hardly any player can do and not many should be permitted to attempt. It is to play a part too young for his size. The lad who brought the toy ship to Captain Barnacle, a day or so before he found the baby, was physically too big to play the cry-baby convincingly. It's a small matter. Aside from it this delightful picture is wholly commendable, and it wasn't necessary to have the hat blown so far; but these are very slight blemishes in an almost perfect picture. The sincerity of the acting of both the scenes of truly typically American business and home life amply cloaks what slight faults it has. The employer is finely portrayed by Charles Agle, but not a whit less convincingly and in harder parts to play, Sidney Booth interprets the man and Miriam Nesbit the man's wife. Their son (Gladys Hulette) also deserves recognition. This is a thoroughly pleasing picture.

"Fidelity" (Pathe).—A very pretty and touching dog picture. A little girl playmate of a big St. Bernard dog dies. Because of lack of money the mother sells the dog, but he is not pleased with his home and each day carries flowers to the grave of his former playmate. One day the mother finds him there and he is taken back, never to be parted from her afterward.

"Their Only Son" (Selig).—A domestic story of a son disposed to be fast and a false accusation against him. Some bonds and money were accidentally pushed into a waste basket and the son was suspected of taking them. He is arrested and freed, but is forbidden the house. The package in the meantime finds its way into the hands of a rag-picker who returns them to the broker. The parents learn that the son has shipped on board a liner. He is found washing dishes.

"Bob's New Scheme" (Lubin).—A rather elaborately worked up scheme for getting to the club is given on this film, but apparently in this instance it worked well. The husband acted the role of policeman through a series of fortuitous circumstances and succeeded in getting there. The taking of the policeman's uniform and escorting the tramp outside was worthy of a great brain. Anyhow, it succeeded, and that was the main proposition after all. The men in the audience seemed much interested in this method of escape.

"The Flaming Arrows" (Pathe).—A Western story with a pretty girl and a bashful cowboy lover. When the girl is on her way to the station to go home the Indians attack the cavalcade and a sensational fight results in which there are flaming arrows and other disagreeable things and the bashful cowboy lover proves a hero. After sufficient agitation of this character the story ends with everybody happy; an important consideration in stories of this sort.

"The Heiress" (Eclipse).—This romantic story deals with the troubles of an heiress who suspects her numerous suitors of wanting her money. Suddenly she pretends to lose her fortune. They all fulfill her expectations and desert her. Next she finds another lover, a poor man, and after testing his devotion she reveals her real identity and astonishes him with her wealth. It is a pretty enough romance, one of the kind that seem always to please the audience.

"Lyons, the Second City of France" (Eclipse).—A series of excellent views of the city, calculated to indicate not alone its picturesque and artistic features, but its information of commercial value as well. The rivers are shown in a way to make them interesting portions of the scenery and there are views of the leading streets and important buildings which afford opportunity to know the city as it is. The mechanical work is well done and the pictures are clear and well composed.

"The Adventures of a Baby" (Edison).—A bright bit of comedy detailing the difficulty of a bachelor and a baby. The mother left it for a moment to get something from the train and is carried away. The young man believing it was a joke on him bestows it upon a prosperous looking man asleep in his chair. He is the young woman's uncle, a bachelor, frightened because the baby is coming and not particularly anxious to find the neice. He wakes up and finds he has a baby and ultimately gets rid of it to a nurse girl in the street where the mother finds it. The gentleman is congratulating himself that his neice and her baby did not come, when the door opens and she walks in, placing in his arms the very baby he gave the nurse gurl a short time before. The bachelor's facial expression during these ordeals furnish fun enough.

"The Stolen Dog" (Edison).—A stolen dog is the principal feature of this comedy. A tramp steals him and sells him for five dollars. He then returns to the owner and says he will find him for twenty-five dollars, five down and the balance on return of the canine. He succeeds in getting him, but before the trade can be consummated the victim appears. A difficulty arises between the two men and it ends with the tramp being forced to give up his money and flee after some rough handling. The two men have a drink in which the dog joins.

"Intrepid Davy" (Vitagraph).—It is sometime since Davy Jones appeared to gladden the heart of an audience. In this film he is quite as funny as he was in these which have gone before. This time he dreams of the Sultan's harem and the way he played havoc with the veiled beauties inside. But when he induces them to remove their face coverings the worst lemons in the orchards seem to have fallen to his share. Ultimately there is trouble in the harem. The sultan discovers the interloper and secures immediate divorces by throwing the whole bunch out of the window. Davy jumps out and hurries away to his ship, satisfied that harems are not altogether what they are supposed to be.

"A General Strike" (Gaumont).—Herein is shown something of the troubles which would follow a general strike. After everybody is out the committee decides that the milkmen shall return. The city is deserted, people apply at labor headquarters for food and the whole aspect is one of desolation and suffering. Ultimately peace with honor is assured and the wheels of industry revolve once more.

"Love and Silence" (Pathe).—The story is of what the innocent man suffers for the theft of another because of a love affair. One man marries the girl they both love and rather than ruin the happiness of the girl he once loved, the innocent man accepts the consequences and goes to prison. Five years after the guilty man dies and leaves a confession. The re-union of the widow and her former lover follows soon after.

"The City of Singapore" (Pathe).—These are excellent travelogs which come from the Pathe studio and give clear impressions of the people and their habits of life in distant portions of the world. Like all the travel pictures Pathe sends out, this one is made and finished with consummate care. It is well worth the time and effort expended upon it.

"That Daredevil" (Biograph).—The object of this film seems to be to present a travesty upon the laudation which sometimes follows deeds of bravery. Dan is made a hero of by his sweetheart who pushes him in the lake where a child is struggling in the water. Fortunately for Dan the water is shallow, else his reputation would have suffered. He is made a policeman. One day he goes swimming. Some boys steal his uniform and lay the coat on the wharf. Then the unexpected occurs. He is praised for saving a life and stands hidden in the bushes clad only in a bathing suit while the throng believe he gave his life for another.

"An Interrupted Game" (Biograph).—If the solution of the difficulty of a husband going to see a sick friend in order to get a chance to play cards suggested here were generally followed there would be fewer invitations. She gives him till ten o'clock. When he doesn't return she goes after him and the friend has to play sick. The result is he is subjected to an application of exceedingly torrid mustard plasters and other forceful remedies. He bears it like a martyr that time, but solemnly swears to "never again."

"Tent Village" (Lubin).—Maybe there are other experiences at the seashore which would make equally funny pictures, but this one is as good as an audience would care to see. Instead of placing their tent in the tent village these seekers for seashore pleasures pitch it some distance from the others. They want air. But they forgot the tide and in the night they wake with the waves washing over them and the ensuing trouble is comical enough. They finally succeed in securing two blankets from the flooded tent in which they wrap themselves and try for the train, but it has gone. After many difficulties they finally reach their city home, vowing never to leave it again for such an elusive thing as a stay in a tent village near the water.

"The Ranchman's Son" (Essanay).—A Western story in which a young man is charged with a murder he did not commit is given here. The man had quarreled with the dead man and was found leaning over him with a revolver in his hand which had been discharged. The jury finds him guilty of murder, notwithstanding his protestations. The real murdered escapes and procures work on the ranch owned by the accused man's father. His conscience troubles him and after finding a paper containing the account of the jury's verdict he rides to the jail and arrives in time to prevent the execution.

"Monuments and Cascades in Rome" (Pathe).—The scenes in this series of views are some of the most interesting in Rome. The monuments and cascades make a list of novel pictures which will furnish information concerning such features of Roman scenery which will be new to a larger proportion of those who see them. The work is done in the highest type of the cinematographic art. It would be hard to make any improvement.

"The Arrow Head" (Lubin).—The principal feature of this picture is the recognition of a young man by means of a birthmark shaped like an arrow head. A photograph of the boy's mother was shown him and by that he recognized a white girl who had recently been rescued from the Indians. Through that mark the family, separated sixteen years before during an Indian attack, were reunited, all but the mother, who was killed at the time. There are Indians, attacking a party of whites and plenty of soldiers to assist in making the picture interesting and there is no lagging of attention on the part of the audience.

"Friday, the 13th" (Edison).—A very good comedy. The succession of mishaps which occur as Gayton tries to do things on the ill-fated day furnish the audience with plenty of amusement. It is a veritable comedy of errors, quite as laughable as anything the Edison people have produced in considerable time.

"An Unexpected Gift" (Pathe).—A poetic idea is interpreted in this picture in a simple-hearted, pious way that makes it effective without its being what could be termed powerful, for it is not very dramatic. "A mother," says one of the leaders on the screen, "cannot be happy when her children are dead." The mother is shown as being tender hearted in her sorrow and gives alms to the poor as she goes to mass. A foundling is brought to the curé and he sends this, a little naked baby boy, on Easter morning, wrapped up in a paper box. It is brought in while she is praying and when she rises, she finds it and is made very happy.

"In Cambodia" (Pathe).—It was a commendable idea to put a clear map on the screen, as the Pathe producer has at the beginning of this picture, for many perhaps, without it, would not have known just where Cambodia is. Those who see this interesting travel film will find instruction and entertainment.

"Tunny Fishing" (Pathe).—In this exciting picture the immense tunny fish are shown as being corraled in hundreds by means of nets drawn together. In this the fish struggle and splash the water fiercely.

"Jimmie's Luck" (Gaumont).—Jimmie appears in this picture in a very battered silk hat and the grandeur and ceremony of his salutations would become a marquis. Jimmie's clothes are wonderous; they must have come from a hundred rag heaps. Jimmie finds a hand bag with money. The card with it gives him an address. As he stands at the gate, another small boy passes and Jimmie thinks that this boy's coat would be a little more appropriate for a formal call and he persuades him to exchange. The purse is in the coat pocket. When Jimmie discovers its absence, he knows, of course, where it has gone. The other boy's parents have discovered the money before he gets there, but he points a pistol at the man and makes him give the money up. The pistol he now shows is really a fan, the same kind of a toy that the Lubin Company used in a recent picture. This is a good and amusing film.

"The Academy Girl" (Gaumont).—This picture of a comic character is on the same film with "Jimmie's Luck." It is amusing and very well acted, though the character, the academy girl, is somewhat unusual. Perhaps it would have been more descriptive to have called this English picture "The High School Girl." The very first picture shows that she is an original and not just like other girls. She inherits a large fortune, including a French village, and her deportment astonishes the simple peasants—it is too near being ridiculous, in places, to be truly funny. There are some exquisite scenes, especially so are the scenes in which she sees the flock of snowy white geese and follows them into the water. These pictures make it really worth while.

"The Ruling Passion" (Biograph).—A typical small boy is the hero of this delightful picture. The last two scenes of it are especially fine. It is almost wholly a children's picture, a play picture, and, aside from its clear and intimate pictures of child characters, the picture as a whole is less interesting than its end. The ruling passion of one of the boys is to be a pirate. First, he gets the other children to play a drama, "The Terrible Pirate," but the audience is not appreciative. Their home is near the ocean and the children's parents are away. The result is that the little heroine and the pirate's mate are last seen far out at sea in a tiny row boat which is fast becoming filled with water. The parents come home and a launch goes out to the rescue. This part isn't very interesting. The last scene in the nursery at the time the sand man comes is a picture that leaves a strong impression.

"Her Two Sons" (Lubin).—The mother was blind, one of her sons was a clergyman and the other, a younger man, was impulsive and not yet grown into his character. Both love the same girl, a neighbor, and the younger man elopes with her and then deserts her. This is a dignified situation, one that handled by a skilful novelist or dramatist would make a great book or drama. One feels that the picture (effective as it is) doesn't really get hold of the core of it. The situation is pictured fairly clearly, but something of the resultant emotion is lost due to its not being absolutely clear. However, as much as we get of it, we are thankful for, and it makes an acceptable picture. The clergyman is played by Arthur Johnson, the girl by Florence Lawrence, and the younger brother by Albert McGovern. The scene where the younger brother abandons his wife is pictured by both well. The scene where the younger brother tells the clergyman that he has tired of his wife and left her is made significant by Johnson. A small boy has an important part in the scenes of the reconciliation after the wife has come back to the village with her baby. It would have been better if this boy had been given a place in the picture before he was actually needed, his presence would have been taken more as a matter of course.

"Billy's Marriage" (Pathe).—The producer of this picture had a rich comic situation and one not too trite and he had good actors. But his method of conducting it leads one to suspect that he didn't count it really worth while. The chase of the elopers by an angry father is trite, but the situation didn't require it. The producer used it and kept it from being trite by trick plays. The father jumps across a sizable river. Some of the comic incidents are too foolish to be funny, as for only one instance, the pouring of milk into the automobile's cooling system. The lovers are married before the father catches them and the groom then shows him his own written opinion, as a lawyer, that a man who loves a girl whose father dislikes him should elope.

"Scenes at the Flower Carnival, Paris" (Pathe).—It was worth while picturing the Paris flower carnival. It is famous and the picture of it is interesting. This flower parade is known, however, mostly by the fact that famous beauties often occupy the embowered chariots. This picture shows clear pictures of the outside of the carriages, but doesn't give any glimpse of those within them.

"Battle of Bunker Hill" (Edison).—This is the third in the series of historical pictures the Edison Company is releasing from time to time. It is good, but not so good as the two that have preceded it. The picture of the battle is what might be called a full-faced picture and it isn't effective. This is due mostly to the fact that there are very few British soldiers and also that there are too many actors among the Americans who seem not deeply interested in the outcome of the event. The love story also might have been acted a little more convincingly. It is hard for a grown actor to play the part of a bashful youth pleasingly. The hero of the incident is played by a good actor, but one watching him, longs to have him straighten up and make love like an officer and a gentleman.

"A Turkish Cigarette" (Selig).—This is a dream picture, supposed to be the experience of a tramp who has lighted a Turkish cigarette and fallen asleep. There are some amusing incidents shown and several people laughed, but at no time was the laughter general. It is not a very important film.

"Madam, Who Is that Letter From?" (Selig).—A recent Rex picture entitled "Securing Evidence," utilized the idea that makes this picture go. One cannot help feeling that the same script must have been sold to two manufacturers. The husband in this picture is shown as of such a jealously suspicious nature that he can't attend to his business properly. He had less reason also for thinking that the girl, with his wife's new hat and cloak, is his wife and his antics in chase of her are often ridiculous.

"The Long Skirt" (Vitagraph).—The picture presented on this film is a life portrayal, typical and significant. The young lady who impersonates the girl deserves much praise for the artist-like manner in which she has shown the effect that the long skirt has on the children with whom before she had been content to play as a child with other children and also its consequent effect on her. They won't play with a big, long-skirted girl in the same way as formerly. The girl's mother had been worried because she seemed slow in growing up, but, under the circumstances, this was natural. The only question that arises is, where were the other girls of this girl's age who were growing up with her? However, the most critical of observers will see much poignant human truth in the picture. It is very commendable.

"The Round Up at Dawn" (Kalem).—To keep a picture of this nature alive needs players who can maintain a pleasing impressiin of light-hearted, frolicsomeness, and the girls and men who play this picture were happily chosen. The sole object of the picture is fun. Each scene lives by itself on its humor, so to speak, without bothering to make all details rational. The boys were having so much fun with the girls at the big barbeque that they wouldn't start out at once to herd the cattle back that had broken through the ranch fence. They decide to round the cattle at dawn, but the girls, for a prank, slip into the bunk house and steal the boys' clothes, dress up in them and leave their own skirts. The girls ride out and do the rounding up. The boys don the skirts, meet the girls, and there's a hearty laugh. That is all.

"The Regeneration of Apache Kid" (Selig).—Perhaps this picture's source of power is chiefly in the heart-wringing tragedy of its situation. We are shown a white boy, carried off by Apaches from the red burning of his home. A "leader" then tells us that this boy has grown up and is known as "Apache Kid," the terror of the settlers. We now catch a glimpse of his band on the hillside and we see his resolute and relentless face just for a moment as he rides out of the picture. The expression of the man is good character drawing. It was wise to show him only for a moment at that stage, the picture isn't allowed to become commonplace; the imagination is left to hold it and add to it, unhampered, and the result is that a very deep impression is given of all that the situation implies. A white man, with all a white man's possibilities (this man suggests great possibilities), is shown riding thus. It is heart wringing. The rest of the film doesn't so much add to what has already been shown as bring it into clearer focus or put brighter light on it. In a scene following a truly realistic surprise and skirmish on rocky Arizona hills Apache Kid is captured. The colonel's daughter attempts to regenerate him with the logical result and its sad ending. This tragic close is not pleasant, but it is strong and logical.

"The Flaming Arrows" (Pathe).—The flaming arrows, by means of which the Indians fire the cabin where the white men and the heroine are making their perhaps last stand, are the features of this picture, which otherwise is like other Western love stories. The story is well laid out and well acted. It is likely to be very acceptable.

"The Tramp Artist" (Essanay).—A mischievous tramp offended some bill posters and they started the usual chase. This tramp, however, is a cartoonist and the number of his persuers is increased not, as usual, by his knocking over ladders and smashing crockery, but because, in his flight, he pauses now and then to add some comical touches to signs, making the tobacconist and the German saloon keeper furious so that they also join the chase. A novel idea.

"Judge Simpkins' Summer Court" (Essanay).—On the chance of earning a few shillings helping to move a hen-coop for a neighboring farmer, Judge Simpkins adjourned court. Three tramps, one of whom was a magician, finding the court vacant, occupy it and begin to exact toll from passing automobilists in the guise of fines. The last victim had no money so they took his erratic motor car and the antics of this lend spice to the ensuing chase by the real officers. They are captured. It's an amusing trick film.

Independent

"The White Red Man" (Rex).—The feature of this picture is the gratitude of an Indian for a kindness shown him. An outlaw robs a coach and is wounded in the fight. He drops a portion of the jewels in his flight through the forest. An Indian picks up some of the jewelry and almost immediately afterward steps into a bear trap. He succeeds in getting his foot out, but it is badly injured. The trapper's wife nurses his wound and in return he gives her some of the jewels. A deputy sheriff soon afterward calls at the cabin for a drink and sees the jewels. He believes the trapper to be the thief and despite the protestations of himself and his family he is taken to jail a considerable distance away. That night the Indian hears of his arrest and immediately proclaims himself the thief, but no one will believe him. He asks for a horse and is refused. So, though lame from his encounter with the bear trap, he starts on foot over mountain and through forest to give his testimony and release an innocent man. A further search reveals the body of the real outlaw, dead from loss of blood, with the remainder of the booty upon him. The picture is far more lively and interesting than can be described and the characters are worked out with skill and understanding.

"The Rranch Girl" (American).—A horse in this Western story unties the ropes which bind his master and goes for help. Then comes a fierce ride in real Western style and a headstrong girl has learned a lesson. She succumbs like a good sport and allows the old foreman to take charge of the ranch and of herself. The story is of a band of toughs who took advantage of a girl, looted her house and ran away with the goods. The loyal former foreman who undertook to prevent the robbery is knocked senseless and bound. His horse unties the knots and carries a note to the man's ranch companions. The result is a running fight and the recovery of the lost valuables. With the usual results at the end.

"Dorothy's Family" (Imp).—This girl took a novel way to test the loyalty of a lover. Two wanted her and she couldn't choose. So she invited in all the ragged children possible. One looks and departs. The other takes part in their entertainment and wins the girl.

"The Queen of Nineveh" (Ambrosio).—The mechanical work in this film is good and it tells a story of intrigue and the murder of a king. The king's young son is spirited away and secreted. Ultimately he appears and arouses the populace against his unnatural mother. She urges her paramour to lead the royal guard against the mob. But he is a coward and shirks his duty. She dons his armor and leads the guard herself. The battle scene is sensational and the young prince singles out the one whom he supposes to be the craven prince. When he has killed him he is astounded to find that he has killed his own mother. Such films have, perhaps, an element of realism, but in the main they are imaginary.

"The City" (Reliance).—In this film the episode of loss of memory through being overcome with heat and worry is made the principal feature. The man's wife cannot find him and he, living in affluence, has forgotten all about her and his child. Rather, his memory of them is dead. One day his own son comes to his office, looking for work, and is employed because of his manly plea. He loses the money intrusted to him to deposit and this leads to the manager going to his mother's home, where the family is brought together. The effect is to restore his memory and once more they are united. The picture is no better and no worse than others of the same type.

"His Wife's Insurance" (Solax).In this film Higgins desires to reduce the liberal avoirdupois of his wife and procures a bottle of anti-fat for doing it. He runs afoul of a policeman who scents danger and when he discovers that the man is renewing his wife's insurance policy he is certain that there is trouble ahead. Then he sees the unfortunate husband introducing poison, really anti-fat, into the wife's coffee. He is arrested and when explanations are made the anti-fat treatment is forthwith discontinued amid the plaudits of the audience.

"A Bum and a Bomb" (Solax).—McGinniss has heard all about the Cammorist outrages and is frightened enough when some friends play a joke on him by sending a Black Hand note. A bum finds a football and takes it to McGinniss' saloon where he demands a drink. Believing that the bum has a bomb the frightened McGinniss places all sorts of good things before the astonished tramp and flees for his life, as he supposes. The comedy is lively and thoroughly enjoyed by the audience.

"Cattle, Gold and Oil" (American).—The resourcefulness of woman is acceptably recognized in this film. A rancher and his wife are making money on their ranch when they learn of the gold possibilities elsewhere. All might have gone well, but their claim was salted and they lost all they invested. But the woman came to the rescue. At her suggestion barrels of crude oil were obtained and poured upon the ground. The seller of the claim was informed that the spot seemed likely to produce oil. He, gullible individual that he is, buys it back at increased price and the couple are well on their way back with an enlarged return before he discovers how badly he has been sold. As an example of a biter bit it is a superb piece of work.

"Dewey" (Champion).—In this film is shown Admiral Dewey and many of the incidents which occurred during the Spanish war. Other important personages are included. Mark Hanna, Mr. Roosevelt and numerous other characters well remembered with it. Along with the story goes one of love and adventure.

"Cupid, the Conqueror" (Thanhouser).—An artist dreams that the girl who rejected him was forced to deliver her heart to Cupid at the muzzle of a revolver. This all happened after Cupid had tried to force her into loving the artist in the usual way. And the dream came true, too, for even though the girl had not positively declined the artist's love, she had been cold and indifferent, but like her surrender to the dream Cupid she finally surrendered to the real Cupid her hand to the artist. The novelty of representing Cupid with firearms makes this an entertaining picture.

"The New Cowboy" (Bison).—A Western picture the principal feature of which is the sound thrashing a bully gets because he forces his unwelcome attentions upon a girl and attempts to compel her to marry him. Her lover is informed of what is transpiring by her little brother. There is a wild ride and a good pummeling for the persistent suitor at the end. It is a novelty to see cowboys use their fists instead of firearms.

"The Cripple" (Lux).—This film presents a love story which had its inception in a business office where a cripple girl and a clerk fall in love. The other employes endeavor to make the cripple miserable and succeed for a time, but when she learns that the girl he meets is his own sister the difficulty is settled and everybody is happy. Even the ill-natured office force is taught a lesson in the transaction.

"A Child's Heroic Act" (Lux).—The child of this story, when her mother, who is in charge of a railway flag station, is bound fast by thieves, runs down the track with the flag and saves the express train. The little player carries her part convincingly. The scene of the capture of the train thieves is not very real, but the picture gives us a good story and is acceptable.

"Bill Tries to Make Bread" (Lux).—The bakers are on strike and Bill tries to make bread. He first buys wheat and threshes it in his room, much to the discomfort of the people in the apartment below. Then he grinds the grain as one would coffee, and mixes the dough, which he attempts to broil over a lamp. He is taken in charge by two very talkative policemen and brought to the station house.

"A Good Natured Man" (Yankee).—The Yankee Company has put this farce on the same reel with "A Children's Paradise." The hero of it is certainly a good natured man. Out for a walk he meets a young couple and ogles the girl for which the man promptly knocks him down. This he truly deserved, but when he is down the man kicks him three times. It was hardly wise to put such brutality into a picture to go on the same reel with "The Children's Paradise." It will possibly offend the best patrons of the former picture. The good natured man, after this drubbing, gets up and heartily thanks the man for the compliment of giving it to him. He then takes his smiling way toward several other difficult adventures, all of which, like a true idiot, he seems greatly to enjoy. It will cause laughter rather than give pleasure.

"A Children's Paradise" (Yankee).—The great mistake of this delightful picture was in not telling us the name and the locality of this immense institution where three thousand children are cared for and given a good time during summer days. The camera man of the Yankee Company well deserves the reputation he has of turning out very good pictures. He has handled this picture of "Fort Plenty" (it is so called on the screen) admirably. We get first a general panorama of the building and grounds, and then details like the dining room and the evening ceremonies around the flag staff as Old Glory is take down for the night. He also has given us a chance to see many children's faces, which are very interesting.

"An Enlisted Man's Honor" (Solax).—A true military atmosphere was given to this picture of a soldier's difficulty.

He was robbed of the company funds entrusted to him and is suspected by his superiors. He escapes and vindicates himself by capturing the thief. The picture will doubtless be very exciting to the average spectator and to the small boy. It is conducted in the approved thrilling way for melodramas, but not convincingly. The camera has maintained a good focus and the faces are clear. A slight tinting would have added very greatly to the beauty of some of the scenes which show a wild torrent flowing over rocks. The picture has many good points and is interesting, but not important.

"The Train Despatcher" (Thanhouser).—So pretty a scene opens this picture of railroad life that it is likely to be at once applauded. The story is very romantic and of the kind that many people prefer. The pretty girl train despatcher is discharged by the new general manager, who believes in having only men for such work. She leaves the city for her home in the country, but this the picture doesn't make clear. Later, while going for a doctor for her sick brother, she finds a dangerous piece of track and running home for her telegraphing outfit climbs a pole and cuts into a wire to warn the despatcher and save the through express which is due. The man at her old desk is drunk and asleep. The manager overhears the key calling and investigates. She saves the express and wins back her old job and perhaps the manager's love. The Thanhouser players act very well. This picture, if not important, is surely a very pretty one.

"Nobody Loves a Fat Woman" (Thanhouser).—This assertion may not be accepted readily or thoroughly. In fact, this picture's great weakness is the sympathy excited by the fat girl who is the unhappy heroine of it. The hero treated her shamefully. His uncle left a will giving him $50,000 if he'd marry her. He tries to love her, but it comes hard; the affection is all the other way. Like a handsome youngster who has yet grown up to know how not to be a cad, he dismisses her brutally after having paid court to her for several weeks at a seaside resort mostly. Some very good pictures of swimming are shown. The swimming adventures of the fat girl are amusing. The story has a German rather than an American flavor. The photography is very good

"The Brand of Fear" (American).—The hero of this story was a coward from birth and, as the picture shows, this was an abnormality due to his mother's fright just before he was born. When, after he has grown up, the girl who has befriended him is captured by outlaws, his character suddenly changes completely and he becomes brave. One may recall that both Peter the Great of Russia and Henry of Navarre were suddenly changed from cowards to the bravest kind of men; but the change in this man is not shown convincingly. Before, he would not even handle a gun, now he shows that he can ride and shoot with the best and fight three to one like an old gunman. He rescues the heroine and sending her on his horse for help, turns on the pursuers alone. The shooting of the outlaws is poor, any Western bad man ought to hit his man at ten feet. However, if the hero had been hit the story would have had to end. The acting, especially of the heroine (Miss Bush, the new American leading lady, takes the part) is very good.

"The Poisoned Flume" (American).—The great open flume that carries irrigating waters passes through the ranch of this story's heroine (Miss Bush). An unscrupulous neighbor poisons this because the heroine won't marry him and he would like to have her land and cattle. The cattle drink of the water in the flume near the place where the bag of poison has been left and some of them die. Her cowboys suspect the cause and after the new manager has been shot by the poisoner, there is a man chase over a dusty hillside. This ends in a pistol fight. The villain has crawled along the tressle that carries the flume over a valley. A good many shots are fired and the bad man falls dead into the flume. The scenes and views are very interesting. Some of them are too evidently "being played" to be as effective as they might have been, but the acting is very good and the picture acceptable.

"Three Calls" (Champion).—The calls referred to were heliographic and two passed between the hero (Confederate captain) and the heroine, a Southern girl whom he had taught the code. The first call was "I love you." She sent it from her dooryard to the station up on the hill and the squad had a laugh on the captain. It was the girl who saw the message flashed for help from the hilltop when the squad was attacked by Union troops and she sent the relief that beat the Yankees back. The hero has been wounded and his mind is gone. The third call is the scheme suggested by the girl to recall the man's senses; it is to reenact the incident in which the man's wound was received and to make him think that the heliogram has called assistance and saved the party. This is done and he awakes. The picture is not conducted so as to make a strong appeal to critical spectators. If the producer had given more time to his minor characters some of the scenes would easily have been improved, notably the one showing the wounded after the attack. The play is not convincing, but has liveliness and more or less fire.

"A Boy's Best Friend" (Imp).—It is a picture of a boy and his mother; it has very emotional scenes; but to this reviewer, it doesn't seem to hang together very convincingly. The son is a successful broker and his mother, in another town, is very sick. First he answers her plea to see him by saying that he can't come and then, before his open fire in his finely furnished apartment, he falls asleep and, in a dream, pictures that show his mother's never tiring kindness come to him. Many of these pictures are convincing, but if these are taken as true, it makes one or two of them seem improbable. It was of course impossible for him to have dreamed of his cradle; that was the first picture. When his father had dismissed him, in the city, he was without work and hungry, he is shown as receiving a letter from his mother and a basket of food. The letter was peculiar and not typical; the broiled chicken and the cake were all right. As a result of these dream pictures (which were not photographed in a different light from the real things that are shown) the broker goes home and makes amends for the unnecessarily, brutally curt letter he had sent to his mother. The theme deserved a better picture; but just as it is, it is quite acceptable.

"Behind the Times" (Imp).—A picture of clerical life is presented on this film. The hero of this drama is an old minister, who seems to his flock no longer capable of doing the work required. Purposely the producer has hidden every thing that would show to what denomination the man belonged. He has a wife, but there's a crucifix behind the pulpit in his church and he makes the sign of the cross in his service. It is shown that young ladies run the church; they often do, but not so boldly as in this picture. It was almost brutal for the whole committee to go to the parsonage to tell the kindly and venerable old man that he was no longer wanted. That wasn't "breaking it" to him. A young minister is called who is hardly worthy to tie the old man's shoestrings. The young ladies soon find this out, and recall the old man. The picture makes a brave attempt to portray life; but, in many ways, it fails of success. It is acted intelligently, but never powerfully, yet it is acceptable.

"Teddy Trained by His Mother" (Great Northern).—The Teddy of this picture is a cub bear who plays with his mother like a frolicsome kitten. The mother makes him learn to climb up the bars of his cage. It's a very interesting picture.

"Foolshead as a Manikin" (Itala).—Perhaps no other actor can be quite so laughably ridiculous as Foolshead.

"The Blunted Sword" (Itala).—The French officer gave his fool servant a sword to sharpen. The servant goes out to find a scissors grinder and there follows a farcial, rough and tumble, crockery-breaking chase.

"Mut and Jeff in the Banking Business" (Nestor).—There is more fun in this picture of the melting away of Jeff's little legacy than in any of this series that this reviewer has so far seen. The banking business was Mutt's scheme. The scenes that picture to us the results of this banking experiment have something of human truth to rest upon and a good chance of getting hold of an audience. The characters of the pictures are very well played. It might have been more fun to have had the hands of the clock in the banking office go around by themselves.

"Hands Across the Cradle" (Nestor).—Pretty, homely scenes fairly well acted (a little too much to the camera) give this picture a pleasing heart-interest. It was conducted so as to bring out all the comedy possible rather than to present a truly human situation. This was especially true of the scenes in which the two fathers appear after their quarrel the cause of which was not made very clear. These two men, old war-time comrades, are brought together again over the cradle of their common grandchild. Their quarrel had been so hot that, if the mothers hadn't arranged an elopement, it would have separated the two lovers. The meeting of the two grandfathers at the cradle was partly spoiled by their playing for the laugh; but the picture as a whole is sure to please.

"Roped and Tied" (Nestor).—A speedy and very interesting comedy love story is shown to us with Western ranch life for its background. Though made up mostly of old elements, with the triangle love affair and the girl's small brother, who dresses up in his sister's riding suit and, with a veil over his face, fools the father and the unwelcome lover who follow on horseback while the true lovers are being married, it is nevertheless freshly pleasing. It is well acted, well conducted and has several delightful minor scenes. The photographs are all clear and some of the scenes have much pictorial beauty.

"The Babes in the Wood" (Powers).—Exclamations of pleasure were heard as this delightful fairy story was projected. The Powers producer and costumer have closely followed the old, well-known illustrations of this story, as far as possible, and the players seem to have taken pleasure in putting it over in the true spirit. It was produced under the direction of Mr. Fred Walton, the well-known pantomimist. The acting is very good and the photographs are clear.

"Toto's Little Cart" (Itala).—Honest Toto is in very hard luck again. A policeman compels a stranger to walk on with Toto's cart and won't let him explain. This little incident, which is the cause of a rough and tumble chase, with the usual catastrophes of such, is very human. The chase brings a wildly gesticulating crowd to Toto's little green grocer shop.

"The Colonel's Daughter" (Rex).—With plot and counterplot frankly handled to get the most thrill out of every situation, this well-acted, but very melodramatic picture, is likely to please most audiences and the highbrows are likely to get much pleasure out of it, it is so perfect a specimen of its kind—"the regular thriller." There is nothing in it that will displease any sensible person. The colonel's daughter loves the hero, a captain, but the villain, also a captain, with the aid of an adventuress, deceives the girl into thinking him untrue. The villain has struck a private soldier and this, at the climax, is his undoing, for this man overhears him talking with the adventuress. The villain shuts this woman accomplice in a vault. The soldier sets her free and, to get even with the villain, she confesses to the colonel's daughter and the villain's trickery is exposed. The background of the play is an old fortress and this, with its big guns, makes many romantic and in some cases very beautiful scenes. The picture is played just as it should be. It is commendable.

"How the Cinema Protects Itself Against Strikes" (Eclair).—It takes a good deal of clever manipulating and preparation to arrange so surprising a trick-film as this is. The cinema can do without help. Its work can be done by magic. The head manager only needs to touch a spring in the office and the scenery is placed, the actors costumed and all is ready for the picture.

"Mutt and Jeff and the Goldstein Burglars" (Nestor).—Once again these two comedians encounter much trouble. This time they undertake sleuthing, desiring to win fame and fortune by catching two burglars. The scrapes they get into will keep your audience roaring. They get out until they are themselves arrested as the burglars. The real crooks are ultimately caught and the two friends are released. They solemnly vow never again to undertake detective work. If they would be as funny next time the audience wouldn't care particularly.

"The Mother's Mark" (Great Northern).—In this picture the principal feature is the recognition which comes to two brothers through a tattoo mark placed upon the arm of one of them by their mother. After long separation they meet, though one is about to commit burglary and possibly murder. A sister is at work in the same house. Through this mark the family is reunited and there is happiness in store for them.

"Lone Eagle's Trust" (Powers).—There are thrills in this picture. Here is a girl suspended on a cliff where she has fallen. An Indian, whom her father had befriended, finds her and with his lariat is drawing her to safety when his tribal enemy appears and undertakes to get a double vengeance by cutting the lariat and thereby killing them both. But before he can accomplish it the girl's father shoots him. Before he dies he shoots the friendly Indian and it looks as though they would all roll to the bottom of the cliff. But they do not. The enemy does, but the others are restored to their friends after this series of exciting adventures.

"Cheyenne Days" (Powers).—Very excellent photographs make this a very acceptable picture of unusual rope throwing by Art Bowden, the champion lariat twirler, and of remarkable riding by Otto Kline, a broncho buster. The horse Kline rides in this picture is a beauty and wild enough to give him something to do.

"A Harmless Flirtation" (Powers).—A richly comic idea is utilized in this very funny picture. It is cynical, but very amusing. It's author is said to have laughed himself to death.

"Her Father's Secretary" (Yankee).—The rich man's son in this picture has adventures very like his numerous brothers, who have been appearing in pictures and stories, but his adventures still seem to interest even in this case, where many of the incidents are brought out with bald amateurishness. The picture's scene of the rescue from the sea of the banker's daughter by the "son of the idle rich," whose father has cast him off, is very well handled. But other scenes, such as that in which the burglar in the banker's house, frightened, hides the jewels he has stolen, not in his pocket, but in the hero's grip, are not convincing. The hero because of a baronet who also is courting the heroine has resigned his position with the banker and is about to depart. The burglar jumps from a window and the police on the street capture him and are bringing him up the front steps. Frightened by the discovered loss the banker has telephoned to the central police office and a plain clothes man has already arrived. He asks to look in the hero's grip and finds the gems. By this time, though, the policemen have arrived at the door with the burglar and bring him in. This arrangement surely shows very amateurish workmanship.

"The Phoney Ring" (Solax).—Perhaps it is a mistake to assume that photoplay goers are largely slangy. This reviewer fears that at least one-half who see this picture will fail to understand what a phoney ring is. The picture has a good idea behind it; but isn't as funny as it might have been. The paste diamond, which the wife thought was her birthday present, got mixed with the true diamond ring which the husband bought to replace it. What follows the husband's throwing the good stone out of the window is amusing, but the assault of the tough upon him is very unconvincing, very poor. In fact, while the picture has an amusing situation, one that was used not long ago in a licensed picture, its value is diminishel by the "phoney" characters in it.

"Let Not Man Put Asunder" (Solax).—The object of this picture is commendable and though it lacks power, being unconvincing, some poetic scenes well photographed make it fairly acceptable. The mother and father separate and the court gives one of their two children to the care of each. The mother becomes a poor seamstress. The children are lonely and bring the man and woman together once more. They communicate with each other by means of carrier pigeons. The father hearing of the mother's distress brings food to her in a big basket.

"Italian Artillery" (Ambrosio).—A day's maneuvers of a command of Italian artillery are shown on this film. It is a mountainous country and a mild day in winter with deep snow on the ground. The command takes its guns up a very steep hillside and occupies a strong position on the height. It is not an important picture, but interesting.

"Tweedledum and the Adventuress" (Ambrosio).—The lively pace of this comic detective story and its surprises will probably make it a good popular picture. The adventuress has robbed a nobleman and locked him up in a stone tower and he has written on his linen collar asking Tweedledum to come to his assistance. Tweedledum's adventures with the adventuress come fast and they happen so unexpectedly that they're funny.

Manufacturers Advance Notes

THE BIG CHEESE.

Selig Company to Make Pictures Showing Construction of a Six-Ton Morsel by Order of the Government.

Within ten days or two weeks the Selig Company will send a corps of camera men to Appleton, Wis., to secure moving pictures of the construction of the largest cheese ever made. N. Simon, the American cheese expert, who has the contract for making this gigantic morsel, will personally superintend the construction and give every possible aid.

Scenes will be secured of the Sanitary Dairy Farm; the herds of Guernsey, Holstein and other pure breed cattle; of the milking, cooling and caring for the milk, placing it in cans and of the wagons and automobiles carrying it to the cheese factories; the work in the factories of preparing the curd for the big cheese and transporting that to the Simon plant and then the work of the twenty expert cheese makers and twice as many helpers in making the 12,000-pound cheese will be photographed in every detail.

Under the contract with the government, which ordered these motion pictures as a means of education, the pictures are to be shown in the moving picture shows to at least 5,000,000 people and then the Department of Agriculture of the Federal Government will secure the photographs and place them on file at Washington.

The cheese will be three times larger than the largest cheese ever manufactured before, and will consume some five weeks in the making. Secretary James Wilson, of the Department of Agriculture, will, in all probability, be present in person to witness the event and oversee the making of the pictures.

The press of the country are giving this incident a great deal of notice, which shows their interest in moving pictures of an educational nature.

FREE POSTERS FOR THANHOUSER'S "ROMEO AND JULIET."

The Thanhouser Company announces that it will provide extra billing matter gratis for its big two-reel subject, "Romeo and Juliet," soon to be released. It is suggested by the Thanhouser Company that this splendid subject will be the proper thing for the fall opening and the extra billing matter may be used for an extensive advertising campaign. Those desiring these posters may obtain them by addressing the Show Department, Thanhouser Company, New Rochelle, N. Y.

IMPROVED PROJECTION.

Mr. Lavezzi admits that he made several mistakes when he started in business; he would also like to know of an inventor who has not made mistakes. The testimonials that appeared in a recent issue of this paper, (page 401) show the progress of his inventions. Mr. Lavezzi puts these testimonials before the trade for the benefit of all skeptical people who demand to be shown.

"THROUGH FIRE AND SMOKE."

A Selig Fire Drama That is Exceedingly Realistic—Fourth of the Selig Series.

By Cecil Metcalf.

The other day out in the new concrete exhibition vault at the Selig plant I had the pleasure of witnessing a private exhibition of what promises to be the greatest fire picture ever produced. I have always taken a great interest in the Selig fire subjects and had imagined that it would be practically impossible for this concern to improve upon the subjects already released, namely: "The Fire Chief's Daughter," "The Craven Heart," and "The Still Alarm," but Selig has a way of releasing his pictures so that each new one is better than its predecessor.

Scene from "Through Fire and Smoke."—(Selig).

Tom Gaylor, a handsome fireman, played by Mr. Santschi, and Betty St. Claire, a pretty factory girl, played by Miss Harte, are engaged to be married and each morning they exchange confidences before going their separate ways to enter on the day's work. One of these mornings, Betty meets Herbert Crane (played by Mr. Rawlinson), who is the manager of her department in the factory. He accompanies her to the factory and the girl's heart dances with exultation as he appears on the floor with her in sight of the other girls.

Bauman's factory, in which they are employed, is anything but up to date and during the course of the day Bauman is taken by the fire inspector to visit a more model structure, where he is informed that he must remodel his own so that it will conform to this one. That noon, young Herbert continues his attentions toward Betty, by inviting her to lunch. Herbert continues his attentions toward Betty, much to her mother's disgust, and the girl, swept off her feet by his generosity, gives poor Tom his conge and encourages the young manager. Thus far the story has merely led up to the scenes showing the fire, rescues, etc., and now the thrilling part begins.

Herbert is seen lingering a moment beside Betty's machine on the factory floor, where hundreds of girls are employed making overalls. As he is about to leave, he accidentally brushes against a newly painted can which leaves its traces on his otherwise immaculate coat. He becomes very angry at this and immediately goes to the storeroom to remove the spots with gasoline. He lights the gas, but has no more than begun his task, when he is called outside to settle some complaint. The uncorked bottle is left standing under the gas jet.

Then comes the inevitable explosion and we see the window glass break and doors crash from their casings. In a moment the big room is filled with stifling smoke, pandemonium reigns supreme and the terrified girls rush madly for the elevator and stairways. After one trip the elevator fails to run and the windows offer the only possible chance for escape. Already the stairway and elevator shaft are one seething mass of flames—and we watch one girl after another drop from sight to serious injury or certain death.

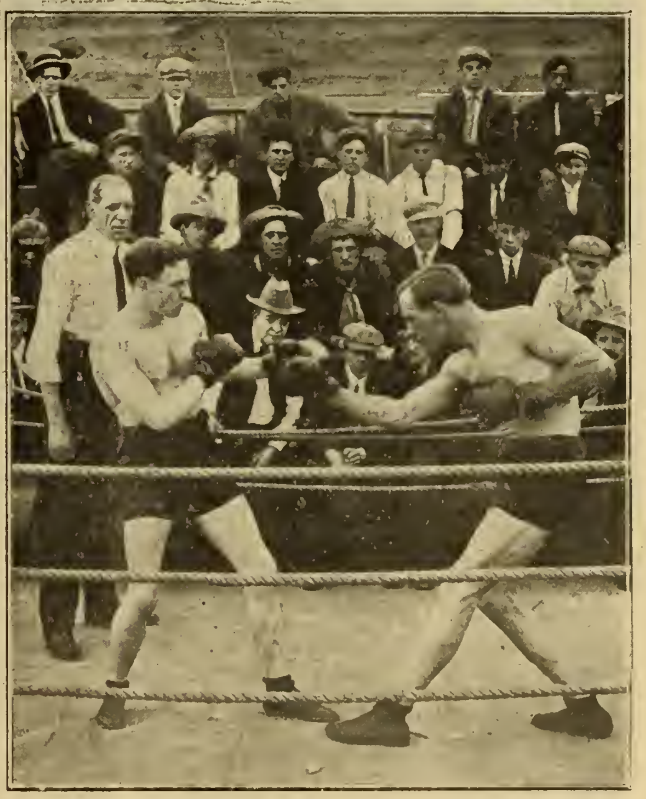
Tom's engine house has received the first alarm, and we see the expression on his face as he realizes that Betty's life is in danger. We see the firemen slide down the poles, jump into their coats, the hitchup and within a few seconds they are out of their barn and racing madly toward the scene of action.

Again our scene changes back to the panic stricken girls in the blazing factory. Betty has found a rope and rushes toward one of the windows to effect her escape—but Herbert proves himself a yellow cur by wrenching the rope from the girl's hands in order to save his own skin. By this time Tom has arrived and in a jiffy a ladder run up to the windows. His position is indeed perilous, but he gamely climbs the ladder, fights his way through the flame and smoke and returns with his loved one in his arms.

The next day Herbert tries to square himself by apologizing, but the girl will have none of him, and the hero Tom promptly throws him out.

Scene from "Through Fire and Smoke."—(Selig).

The principal scenes in this picture were secured during the great Byrne Building fire in Los Angeles recently. The Selig Company were on hand with their corps of actors and camera men, as soon as the fire department itself arrived upon the scene. The Selig Company had an arrangement with the fire department whereby they were allowed to work in the very midst of the conflagration, and Mr. Santschi and Miss Harte risked their lives to secure the great rescue scene which is a thrilling feature of this reel. It is my opinion that it will be many years before a fire picture equal to this one will be secured.



Scene from "The Parson and the Bully."—(Nestor).

THE HAUNTED HOUSE.—(Imp.)

"The Haunted House," a forthcoming Imp release, is a well told drama, the scenes being rural. Many of the characters will be readily recognized as being mentioned in song and story. An old miser has a mortgage on a house owned by a hard-working man and he schemes to ruin its value as a rental property by spreading the report that it is haunted. The old skinflint goes further and does the ghostly masquerading himself. The villagers are appalled at the sights they see and the sounds they hear emanating from the house. The owner of the house has a pretty daughter, who sympathizes with her father in his adversity. A young man comes to the hamlet to take charge of the railroad business at the unimportant station and sees the daughter. He is smitten with her charms and incidentally learns of the haunted house which furnishes food for much reflection. He resolves to do a little investigating, taking no stock in the story. Trailing the miser to the house he detects him in the act of making the uncanny actions and has a key to the solution. He follows the old villain into the deserted place and up on the roof where the white-robed apparition appears to the terror of the frightened villagers below. Grappling with him the sheet is removed and the masquerader appears in his proper form, exposed and disgraced. The witnesses are angry and the miser barely escapes a lynching. The young man is rewarded by the hand of the girl of course, as the natural sequence. It is a very interesting story, true to life with fidelity to the types represented.

Scene from "The Haunted House."—(Imp).

THE COLONEL'S DAUGHTER (Rex).

The Rex company have prepared something in the way of a military story for their August 17th release. The picture is one that will not be especially relished by colonels or their daughters or by army men in general. Outside of garrison towns the story will probably be accepted by the general public as possible and even probable. Army posts have always furnished their proportionate share of scandal to the columns of the daily press. After a certain affair down on Long Island a year or so ago, nothing in the way of a "military drama" can be set down as impossible or improbable, and for that reason the guns of the critic are spiked at the very outset.

"The Colonel's Daughter" is not a "war drama," it is a "military drama." There is a distinction and a difference. A war drama usually deals with heroism and sacrifice and love of flag or country. It is usually inspired by, and in turn inspires, lofty thoughts, etc., etc. A "military drama" as a rule deals with the pettiness of life in a military garrison. It seems to be a fairly well accepted belief that when army officers are not dying for their country they are engaged in all sorts of meanness and intrigue among themselves. If Kipling can become rich and famous by writing of the bickerings, the snobbishness, the jealousies, the guilty loves and general sordidness of a military post, then the Rex company is justified by illustrious precedent in producing "The Colonel's Daughter."

Personally, the colonel's daughter is all right. She is above reproach or suspicion, as is the manly young lieutenant who betrays his love for her early in the story. It soon transpires that another officer is in love with the colonel's daughter. A glance at his determined countenance is sufficient to know that he is a man who will brook no obstacles in the path of his ambition or desire. He is one of those unfathomable creatures who win by foul means if they cannot win by fair. The fair means gave out very quickly in this case and cunning was resorted to without hesitation.

The unscrupulous captain made arrangements with an adventuress to attend a garrison ball and there to lure the young lady's favored suitor into a compromising position. This she succeeds in doing while the unworthy captain manages to have the colonel's daughter in the vicinity to witness the apparent duplicity of her lover. For a while things break wrong for the honest lieutenant because his lady love believes her eyes. In the meantime, however, the adventuress has been blackmailing the officer for whom she did the dirty work. After she has bled him for all the money he can raise, he makes an attempt to strangle her. In revenge the adventuress goes to the colonel's daughter, confesses her part of the deception, and exposes the underhanded work of her unscrupulous suitor. The picture does not end in a clinch.

ACME FILM COMPANY

Secures Greater New York Rights to "Temptation of a Great City."

The Monopol Film Company have sold the Greater New York rights of the "Temptation of a Great City" to the Acme Film Company, 12 East 15th Street, who are now booking same throughout Greater New York, and they report that theaters exhibiting this wonderful feature are highly elated with the drawing power and financial success of this film. The Acme Film Company reports this film is booked solid for several weeks, and from all appearances it promises a phenomenal run for a dramatic film.

KINEMACOLOR SOUND EFFECTS.

An interesting feature of the Kinemacolor Coronation pictures at the Herald Square Theater, New York, is the introduction of sound effects which are furnished by the Yerkes Manufacturing Company. Managers of moving picture shows will do well to witness a performance and judge for themselves the absolute realism of the effects manufactured by this firm of nature fakirs.

Mr. Harry A. Yerkes has devoted his entire time and attention to the working out of novel sound imitations for moving pictures and the Yerkes factory, which occupies the entire building at 202 E. 88th St., New York, is working day and night supplying wide-awake managers with Yerkes sound effects.

"THE TOSS OF A COIN."

The adventures of a tramp, down and out, with every man's hand against him, forms the theme of a drama recently produced by the Imp Company. The finale is pleasing, for the unfortunate not only finds a home, but wins the hand of a lovable young woman, the daughter of the farmer, who has befriended him. It is a pathetic story, the Imp man says, with the hero driven to desperation to such an extent that he gambles with fate in the way of flipping a coin to decide whether he shall resume his wanderings or end it all in a watery grave. Just as he is about to clamber over the railing of a bridge to cast himself into the water fate again intervenes in the person of a tiller of the soil who is in search of a farm hand. He engages the tramp on the spot and from that instant the star of the nomad is in the ascendency. How he saves the farmer's wallet by arresting two of his former companions when appearances are against him clears himself and the girl, and receives the blessings of his employer, winning the girl, makes a pretty and entertaining story of everyday life.

JESSE JAMES FILM CENSORED.

J. Ernest Eichenlaub, president of the Eichenlaub Attractions, Chicago, Ill., announces that the "Jesse James Pictures," which have given rise to so much adverse comment, have been subjected to a complete revision and that all the objectionable features have been cut out and destroyed. In their stead a clean Western picture based upon the adventures of the famous bandit has been produced. It is 2,000 feet long (two reels), and is full of life and action. This picture is being placed by the Eichenlaub Attractions on the State franchise plan.

A SCREEN TEST.

The accompanying engraving was designed to illustrate the comparative reflecting powers of the "Chemo-Crystal Curtain" and several other curtain materials. The "Chemo-Crystal" is used as a background for the others, which are of white sign cloth, muslin coated with alabastine, aluminum over a prepared surface, white satin, and pure aluminum. It will be noticed that the "Chemo-Crystal" sample photographs brighter than the others, which fact is claimed by the manufacturers to prove that it will produce a better picture than can be obtained from screens of the other materials. This screen is made by the Chemo-Crystal Curtain Company, of Spokane, Wash., which claims, among other things, that one may sit close up to the screen while the pictures are being run without experiencing eye strain and without "losing" the picture; also, that a good view of the picture may be obtained from any angle and that it is non-flaking, non-cracking and non-tarnishable.

A. J. Grover and Arthur L. Barron are associated just now in the manufacture of this device, and a stock company is now being formed to begin its manufacture on a large scale.

HANDSOME NEW THEATER FOR CLEVELAND.

As had been announced some time in advance, the Penn Square Theater at Euclid Ave. and E. 55th St., Cleveland, O., opened to the public on Saturday, Aug. 5th. The crowds attending the premier exhibitions would have taxed the capacity of a much larger house than the Penn Square, and every person appeared not only satisfied but delighted with both the theater itself and the entertainment offered. Emil C. Meyer, formerly of the Senate and other theaters of Chicago, is in charge of the new house, which seats 650 persons. Although the doors were opened before the final touches to the operating room had been made, the projection was excellent throughout, with but a few short lapses from perfection itself. Three reels of Licensed pictures are used, the opening program consisting of "Commy, the Canvasser," "The Spender Family," "A Country Cupid" and "An Indian's Appreciation." Musical accompaniment is supplied by an excellent five-piece orchestra directed by Mr. Rich, formerly of the Opera House.

Especial mention must be made of the vocalists engaged for the first month, who are of a standard never before offered by any 10-cent house in this city. Mr. S. De Marius, formerly soloist with Damrosch's Orchestra of New York, sang the "Torreador's Song" from Carmen very effectively. Mme. Mary Lee, formerly with the Sans Souci Opera Co., and also with Mme. Schumann-Heink, sang the "Song of the Soul" from "The Climax," and, like Mr. De Marius, was obliged to respond to an encore.

Among the prominent visitors to the Penn Square on the occasion of its opening were: K. W. Linn, of Pathe Freres; A. W. Wylie, president of the "Sunlight" Metallic Cloth Curtain Co., of Chicago, who installed the screen at the Penn Square; Lindsey A. Woodward, vice-president of the Enterprise Optical Co., of Chicago; Don J. Bell, of the Bell & Howell Co., also of Chicago; Mr. Swett, of the Edengraph Mfg. Co., and Mr. Marcus, of Cleveland, manager of the Globe Theater. The press was represented by Archie Bell of the Plain-Dealer and Wm. E. Sage, of the Leader.

The Penn Square is typical of the new trend of development in the exhibition of motion pictures, and will undoubtedly be a most successful house.

OPPRESSIVE FIRE LAWS IN ATLANTA.

Members of the T. M. A. of Atlanta, Ga., are trying to convince the lawmakers of that city that the public is already sufficiently protected and that the ordinance now under consideration limiting the seating capacity of picture theatres is unnecessary. This statement has been issued by the T. M. A.:

"The laws in Atlanta are stronger now than those in New York city. This order is willing to compare the fire losses of theaters with any other class of business. Theaters are no more subject to panics than any other business (where large crowds congregate), which make no effort to secure fire protection as the theaters do. In the steel cased, asbestos-lined operating room, a bonfire could be built without any danger. What other class of business is so protected?"

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

SOME KINDLY CRITICISMS.

New Orleans, La., Aug. 11, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—Can you give me a little space in your valuable paper? A new reader of your magazine, but a constant patron of the picture show from its inception, my opinion might carry some small meed of effect.

Why do exhibitors living in the South show plays that offend Southern opinions and traditions? No one knows better than we that we were defeated—overwhelmed is not a bad word—but it isn't agreeable to have the thing rubbed in, until an evening of innocently sought diversion ends in a sense of choking resentment. The best educated people, North and South, no longer cling to extreme views, and can mingle freely in social intercourse with never a fear of friction, yet I have witnessed scenes and sentiments in moving picture plays that harked back to the radicalism of reconstruction days. I, and others, would avoid the best show ever presented to escape one such film.

There is scarcely any dissenting voice to the statement that we are glad the slaves are free, yet remember, please, that when the spectacle of Mr. Lincoln removing the shackles from an idealized bunch of darkies is served up to us, the scene is a reminder to the South of her forcible impoverishment, and as such cannot be regarded as an "uplift" or an amusement. Let the man who gathers his shekels from the defeated brother, for business reasons, if not for common courtesy's sake, show some regard for his patron's traditions.

One of the prettiest war stories I have seen, was "The Soldier's Ring," a recent release from the Selig Company. The women were specially happy and correct in their portrayal of the dignity and sweetness of the Southern women of the period. However, one discordant note that afforded a moment of keen amusement to the informed, was the negro servant. He was as funny, not to be so intended, as a thing could be. His manner of receiving orders from a Southern mistress would have done credit to a governor, receiving a polite commission from a lady whom he knew but slightly, and his stiff unwillingness in placing chairs for the Confederate generals was an unreal interpretation. The Virginia darkey knew his place, and his manner was a very fine and subtle blend of dignity and respectfulness, difficult of portrayal to those not in the know. The Selig actor who took the part, while reveling in outweighing advantages, no doubt was certainly not familiar with good Southern usage, as the slaves of the households were. I thought him a very modern type of the educated negro, unable to sink his strong opinions on the subject of the story, for the sake of better acting.

The woman playing the colored servant to Mr. Walthall's pathetic hero in the touching little Pathe drama, "Waiting," gave a piece of good acting which rang true. The colored servants of the past respected and admired those they served, regarding them as friends of a superior rank.

To pass to another phase of the moving picture world. It would scarce be good business policy to work the educational and Sunday school idea too hard. Even the most moral of patrons, and the greatest thirsters for knowledge, go to the picture shows for relaxation. An "uplift" is always admissible in this connection, for human nature proudly responds to a portrayal of high emotions—it is a sort of vicarious goodness that leaves a warm thrill of self-approval. But don't try to teach us too much and too evidently. As for the classics, they are good served up singly and beautifully as at present, but woe to the prodncer or exhibitor who undertakes to dish up this epicurean diet to the exclusion of plainer fare. "Enoch Arden" has been much advertised, and was no doubt very beautiful, but there were people who, being educated sufficiently to discriminate even in classics, stayed away because they didn't like the story. The classics are such largely because of this master touch in narrative—emotions can be portrayed in any setting, of any period, and the majority of us are at preseut enamored of modern things. Ask the theater men.

I would like to suggest mildly that we be not too hard on the Censor Board for passing certain plays of a religious setting unpleasant to some people. One of the finest treats we have had was a drama of this sort from the Pathe Company. It vividly and convincingly portrayed the mad desire of youth for freedom and pleasure—the successful search for both, followed by distressful failure—and the logical ending of a chastened soul at the feet of Christ. Surely, most moral and uplifting.

Let us continue to have plots of everyday American life well acted—their number should not fail, so long as the game of life is played before us, with its incalculable number of possible combinations.

Very truly yours,

WILSON WALKER.

CONGRATULATES THE WORLD.

Alameda, Cal., Aug. 5, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—I enclose a clipping from one of the local papers, considered a very conservative and influential publication, which is self-explanatory. I know that our desire to see motion pictures given the place they deserve, are mutual and this clipping will, no doubt, make you feel encouraged, as it has me.

I want to congratulate your publication in the strides it has made recently, and while I have always considered it the one motion picture publication, your recent enlargement has made it even more indispensable to the theater owner, manager, and operator.

I might say a friendly word of encouragement for sevearl of your departments, particularly the projection and musical sections, which are always very carefully perused by myself and force. I thiuk the work of your Mr. Richardson is doing a vast good for the future of the picture business, for to my mind, poor projection anywhere hurts the business as a whole. Later this will be overcome when pictures have been given the position they rightly deserve, at which time poor projection will not be tolerated by a critical and appreciating public.

I have always demanded and received the best in projection and the success of my two houses here I attribute, in a great measure, to that. No expense has been spared at any time to achieve the results.

I heartily endorse the opeu market that you have been advocating and sincerely hope that it will become a reality. Also your endeavor to organize a national exhibitors' league is another step for the better. Was sorry that I could not be at the Cleveland meeting, this month.

With my very best wishes, I am, yours very truly,

W. B. MARTIN.

WANTS MORE EXACT DESCRIPTIONS.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—Will you kindly allow me space in your valuable paper, to say a few words for the benefit of musicians who "play the pictures?" I don't know whether Mr. Sinn has written on the same subject or not, but if he has, it will do no harm to say a few words more and it may do some good. I refer to a more accurate description of the films so that a musician could play the first show correctly. Nine times out of ten this cannot be done now by reading the description. The story is given, certainly, but that only gives us an idea of the kind of music to use. In many of the films the story is not begun with the first scene and the musicians have then got to "feel their way" till they find out "where they are at." Now if the manufacturers would give us the story from the beginning as it is in the picture, they would receive the best thanks of the musicians who really "play the pictures." But to those who play "rag" during a death scene, it makes no difference whether the film is described or nor.

Some houses are fortunate in being able to get their pictures early and are able to run them off for the benefit of their musicians, but there are more that are not so fortunate. Some houses do not get their pictures till nearly time to open the show. Now, if the manufacturers will give us an accurate description of the picture, the first show can be played correctly, a thing that is almost an impossibility now. But as it is now, the first show is a case of "guess work" for the majority of moving picture musicians and i hope that the manufacturers will have their pictures described so we can arrange our music from that description and know that it is correct.

When a musical director gets a drama from a stage manager to arrange music for, he knows it is right. Most of the pictures are dramas. Give us accurate descriptions of them, so we can play the first show as well as the last. The patrons will appreciate it and it is a safe bet that the manager will, also. Yours very truly,

Shamokiu, Pa. WILLARD C. BEANE.

MOORE STILL BRANCHING OUT.

Washington, D. C., Aug. 1, 1911.

Editor The Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—Beg to offer thanks for your publication of my interest in issue of Aug. 5, and kind expressions as contained therein. It has been my good fortune to add three more of Washington's most modern and best located houses to my circuit in the past two weeks, the latest of which is the "Navy," constructed at a cost of $38,000, the laregst and most beautiful specially built picture theater in this city, and easily one of the most magnificent theaters in America—capacity 500 people.

Wish to add that since my resignation from the Exchange field, I feel quite myself and "then some," and if I felt any better I couldn't stand it.

Full-page advertisement carried in the Washington Herald by the "Plaza" Theater, Washington, D. C.

This fall will be a strenuous one for me and I expect good returns. My latest advertising campaign has produced great results, is one of the best investments i have ever made, and is paying 100 per cent. or more. My records show that where I spend $100 a week or more, I get double that amount back through the box office. My only drawback is "theater not large enough." No summer business at the Plaza ever equaled the business of today; in fact, we are doing nearly as much as in the best fall weeks, and in consequence expect a banner fall trade.

I enclose "ad" of last Sunday, which may interest you.

Again thanking you and with best wishes for the success of the Moving Picture World, remain, very truly yours,

TOM MOORE.

WHO "EMAR" IS.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—The Foster Theater, Evanston Avenue, Chicago, has enjoyed a very good average patronage during the warm weather, an uninterrupted success due mainly to good film service by one of the Patents Company exchanges.

But it remained for one film to eclipse records for any kind of weather—"An Old Man's Folly," released by the Essanay Company June 30. No greater crowds have been seen anywhere awaiting admission to each of a full number of exhibitions; an assemblage of men and women that would have graced any regular theater of the highest class. What is more—the people who came to see this picture were first disappointed, as the film did not arrive on the second of August, as announced, and yet a greater crowd assembled on the following evening, hundreds patiently awaiting their chance to enter to the last show of the evening.

And this was no "feature film" at that. A simple story of a foolish old man who leaves his motherless daughter at home to sell his cattle in the city, where he is entrapped by an adventuress who inveigles him into a marriage for his money. Distracted by the usurpation of her mother's place by the intriguante, the daughter leaves her home to find employment in the city. The father soon repents of his folly, and follows his daughter. Passing a moving picture theater he sees a girl enter who looks like his child. He enters the theater, recognizes his daughter in a picture on the screen, and creates a scene. The fact is explained to him that the person he sees is not his daughter, but only a picture. He is directed to the Essanay Studio and there finds his child.

The adventuress, being exposed, is found to be a criminal already married to a convict who is serving a term in prison; the old man is freed of his bonds and returns to his home with his daughter, cured of his folly, and happiness is restored.

What attracted the immense crowds to this performance? That good rural plays, if well done, always find favor with the public is an incontrovertible fact, but that does not account for a record attendance like the one in question; an attendance that would have been considered phenomenal if the play presented had been a well advertised feature film shown under the most favorable conditions as to weather and lack of counter attractions.

Evidently the drawing power of this photoplay was the introduction of a moving picture theater within a moving picture theater, and a photoplay studio in full swing.

If this particular feature is taken to account for the decided success of this film it goes very far to prove the interest of the public in the photoplay and all that pertains thereto in no less degree than is evinced in the people and workings of theaters distinguished as regular.

The author of "An Old Man's Folly" is a stanch old friend of the Moving Picture World who, over the signature "Emar" started the interesting discussion over scenario writing with a contribution entitled, "Concerning Scenario," published in the Moving Picture World July 9, 1910.

As it may interest many readers of the Moving Picture World to know who "Emar" is, I will risk a wigging by divulging the fact that "Emar" is the well-known psychologist, M. Rayon, to whose achievements the leading newspapers have devoted a great deal of space, even to the extent of entire pages.

Rayon entered the scenario field impelled by his great love for the motion pictures. He received one hundred dollars for his first scenario, has written many since and has never been asked to accept a lesser amount for a story that will make a full reel.

Yours truly,

O. DE PRE,
P. O. Box 127, Chicago, Ill.

CRITICIZES THE CRITIC.

Lynn, July 30, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—In a recent issue of your valuable paper your New England correspondent who signs himself "Henry," sent in what I consider a sarcastic article on the Central Square Theater, said article stating that for some unknown reason the management had added vaudeville to its program of pictures, when the majority of the other houses in New England had cut it out. We wonder why?

Now if this writer had ever visited this popular place of amusement—a thing which he has failed to do as yet—and make himself known, he would find that our 1,500 capacity has been taxed daily ever since December 19, our opening. The only reason for adding vaudeville was because we wanted to give our patrons full value for their money, as quality and quantity is none too good for the vast throngs that patronize this theater. The Independent Film Company is giving us the very best of satisfaction in every way, as each and every subject receives round after round of applause daily. We are running all summer and playing to capacity and our motto of a whole lot for a little money is still the rule.

Yours for fair treatment always,

COL. WILLARD G. STANTON,
Mgr. Cen. Sq. Theater,
Lynn, Mass.

WANTS TO SEE PICTURES RULE.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Callellsburg, Ky., Aug. 10, 19100.

Dear Sir—Some time back I noted your article relative to dailies criticizing photoplays, as they have the legitimate plays. Herewith enclosed is a clipping from the Cincinnati Post. Some time ago they had a short but strong (favorable) editorial in our behalf. Keep up your good "uplift" work. I am sending enclosed to show that you are getting results.

In your last issue (page 353) you asked for straightforward criticisms. I have none.

Was pleased to note that you went after the Board of Censors for permitting anti-religious films to pass.

I wish to compliment your reviewer for his frank criticisms. I watch them very closely and place cancellations on every one he does not support. I only hope he will not let up, but continue to give the straight goods.

My heart and soul, so to speak, is in the moving picture business and I want to see it rule the world of amusement in the right way. It's going to do so if it continues upward as it is now doing.

Fortunately I do not have to run first-run, and I have ample time to learn about the various films before I get them. I have barred practically all foreign films, because of vulgarity, etc. They let it slip in every once in a while. Wishing you continued success, I am, yours truly,

A. J. WELLMANN,
Mgr. LYRIC (No Vaudeville).

A "WORLD" ADMIRER.

Cuero, Tex., July 10, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—I have just opened a new airdome here, on Esplanade Street, known as the "Stardome." Am showing only moving pictures; absolutely the best I can get in the State. Using Licensed service; only running six days a week; no Sunday show here; seating 450 people.

I have been a constant reader of the Moving Picture World since I read a copy some three years ago in Springfield, Mo.; so it seems as though I know you personally.

I have never yet written to you, but have intended to write you and add my little word of encouragement to the many others, to help you in your great work.

I have solved some weighty problems in projection; I should say, the Moving Picture World has solved them for me, and I could hardly run a picture show without The World.

I am not a subscriber, for I have been travelling so much; but I always manage to get The World some way.

I am not writing this to get my name in the paper (although I would consider it an honor) just mention the opening of the new Airdome to fine business.

I have so many things to compliment the Editor of The World about, but you being so busy I will just say, everything in The World is just as I would have it, and your article in the July 8th World, "Facts and Comments," express my sentiments to a T.

Thanking you for the patience in reading this letter, and promising to inflict a worse punishment upon you, in the form of a longer but, I hope, more interesting letter, in the very near future, I am, yours very truly,

FRED M. HERNDON.

WHOLESOME MOTION PICTURES PROVING THEIR WORTH.

A few months ago when such promiscuous moving picture offerings were shown in nickelodeons it was contended by some theater managers that it would be almost impossible to secure entertaining and satisfactory films which would meet the public demand for amusement and yet not offend good taste or prove a harm to the children. However, the censorship idea was persisted in until the film makers took notice and established their own censorship. Today the offending or questionable film is the very rare exception, even in cities where no local censor board exists, and yet the nickelodeons never did larger business than they are doing today. Because the nickelodeon patrons formerly had to stand for any sort of picture the film makers sent out was used as a mistaken argument that the daring and raw pictures were what the public wanted. But the introduction of wholesome, clean pictures has proven beyond all question that the public simply endured the bad films because they could not get any choice. The same line of proof will apply equally well in the case of questionable drama which some theater managers contend is necessary to draw profitable business. The general mass of Americans recognize evil, but they do not fancy it.

CORRESPONDENCE

PITTSBURG.

Captain Jim Moore, owner and manager of the Kinedrome Theater, Seventh Avenue, Ybor City, Tampa, Fla., made a flying visit to his friends and relatives at the Smoky Town and Brookville, Pa. The Kinedrome has a seating capacity of 300 and is booked by The Consolidated Amusement Co., using and Independent program. Captain Moore, previous to his connection with the moviug picture iudustry in Florida, was the owuer of one of the finest animal shows in this country. Until about two years ago the captain owned and operated a chain of theaters in Florida, consisting of The Juanita Airdome, Pathe Theater and West Temple Theater, but from then on his efforts have been centered on the Kinedrome only, with marked success. The captain is very optimistic iu his views on Florida moving picture prospects, stating that business is up to expectations. He also stated that with almost one accord, the houses have discontinued vaudeville altogether, and that straight moving pictures seem to be the rule. The captain, although born and bred in Pittsburg, has proven himself a very apt pupil to Southern ways, and it is only with difficulty that one can discern that he is of pure northern birth, for he has not ouly adopted the broad Southern ending to his speech, but withal a perfection in the Spanish Language, which, he says, is almost universal iu Tampa.

The Pastime Theater, on Market Street, has switched from Licensed to Independent ranks, after a trial of Licensed film for more than a month. This change took effect on August 14, 1911.

McKee's Theater, on Arlington Avenue, featured the Johnstown Flood Disaster on Wednesday, August 9, 1911, to a capacity business. This feature consists of fifty slides with authentical reproductions of actual scenes at this disaster. H. C. Williams is booking this feature.

The Bonton Theater, owned and managed by O. J. Bennet, has been doing very well during the summer. This theater is located on Sixth Avenue, across the street from The Lyceum, a legitimate playhouse. The seating capacity, although small, being 150, is yet of sufficient size to make the house a paying proposition all the year round in that part of the downtown section. The house is well ventilated and equipped with the latest projectographs. The throw is 70 feet on a 14 x 15 curtain. The curtain is paiuted a light green and it is remarkable how well the picture looks on the screen. Three reels of Licensed pictures form the program. The musical feature of this neat little house is not up to the standard though, for an electric piano has taken the place of playing-to-the-pictures music.

D. C. Shook has taken personal charge of the management of the Theatorium at 4049 Penn Avenue. The Theatorium is a dandy little house, but had been sorely neglected by its former manager. If properly managed, this house can be made into a very profitable proposition, and since Mr. Shook himself has taken charge, a noticeable change has gone into effect, for the house has been thoroughly renovated and painted, both inside and outside. A new electric piano organ aud a latest model projection machine has also been installed. The house at present has a seating capacity of 100, but it is contemplated to add 50 more to it in the near future.

Among photoplay houses in the Bloomfield district, none is more perfect than the Metropolitan Casino, at 4771 Liberty Street, for it may well be defined as one of the "finest." Under the able management of L. M. Hagedorn it has proven itself a paying investment. The seating capacity is at present only 190, but it is contemplated to extend the capacity to 500, which will make it not only the biggest house in Bloomfield, but also one of the largest in the city. The lobby is very neatly decorated and a judicious display of the posters of the day's run add a great deal to its attractiveness. The auditorium is also nicely decorated and is well ventilated by a suction fan that runs up to the roof, and six revolving fans. Although equipped with a plain curtain, the projection is very satisfactory.

On Monday, Aug. 14, Fred Lacy, part owner of the Avenue Theater, on Liberty Avenue, will take complete charge as owner of the Drum Theater, on the same street. Mr. Drum, the former owner, is going to Texas on account of ill health, as soon as his property matters can be properly adjusted. Until then he will take charge of the managership of the Rex Theater, at 6017 Penn Avenue, during Max W. Herring's absence to Atlantic City, on his vacation.

Another change in the Bloomfield photoplay circle was the purchase and remodeling of the old Friendship Theater, at Friendship and Liberty Avenues, by A. H. Bloom. The house has a seating capacity of 200, and with the remodeling, makes it a house to be well proud of.

The Lawrence Theater, at 3407 Butler Street, has been running to pretty good business since its opening, on June 17th, 1911. The location happens to be a very good one and it is to be wondered why the advantages of such a good location hadn't been used before for photoplay purposes. H. C. Kliehm is the manager and proprietor of this house. The house seats 260 to the performance, but has room for 300. The operating room is equipped to the minutest detail. Two Powers No. 6 machines are used as projectors. "Ten Nights in a Barroom," the Selig production, has been advertised very extensively by distributing neat little bulletins, for Wednesday. Mr. Kliehm was formerly part owner and manager of the Delafield Theater, Aspinwall, Pa.

EDDIE WHEELER.

LOUISVILLE.

Realizing that September 1 is drawing near and that a month or six weeks of warm weather is the most that can be expected in local territory, the proprietors of Louisville theaters are casting a prospective eye toward the approach of winter and are beginning to plan such enlargements and improvements as the accommodation of steadily increasing patronage demands. Preparations are being made for the further installation of heating and ventilating apparatus, and before long this additional equipment will be tested out ready for use, for the weather hercabouts is an uncertain quantity, and the show men are determined not to be caught napping by the unexpected advent of a cold snap.

The Crystal, at Third and Market Streets, received the addition of a sunlight screen last week, which now permits the shows to be given without darkening the theater. The screen was made by the Sunlight Metallic Curtain Company, of Chicago, Ill., and is the first one of its kind to be installed in a Louisville show-house. President Wylie, of the Chicago company, came down to this city to superintend the Crystal installation.

Business is reported to be generally satisfactory at The Majestic and The Royal, operated by the Majestic Amusement Company in Louisville. The addition to the Majestic, opposite the Post Office, which will give this house an aggregate seating capacity of 1,500 persons when completed, has begun, and President L. J. Dittmar says that the work will be completed by December 1, at least. A feature of the equipment of the Majestic Amusement Company, in Louisville, is the speedy little automobile belonging to President L. J. Dittmar. Mr. Dittmar is an enthusiastic motorist and has adapted his Maxwell "Sportsman" to his executive work in the photoplay field. From the Majestic, at Fourth and Chestnut Streets, down to The Royal, at Eighteenth Street and Broadway, is only a matter of eight or nine minutes in a motor car, where it would require double that amount of time to make the journey by street car, so that time lost in going from one show to another is practically cut in half by the use of the "buzz-wagon." For a picture show owner, whose interests are scattered and demand considerable attention, there is no equal to the auto as an article of general utility, says Mr. Dittmar.

A hitch in securing necessary machines and films has made it impossible for the exact date of the initial appearance of the Kinemacolor Coronation films in this city to be announced, said L. J. Dittmar. Mr. Dittmar is the organizer of the Kinemacolor Company in Ohio, Indiana and Kentucky, to handle these special films exclusively in those states.

Manager Charles Shaw, at The Avenue, is preparing for the closing weeks of his run of photoplays at that house to be a marked success. It has been announced that the Avenue will return to melodramatic productions shortly after September 1. Two stirring plays, which proved especially appealing in this week's offerings at The Avenue, were, "The Squaw's Sacrifice," and "American Army Maneuvers in Cuba." Manager Shaw has secured the services of Joe Everich, formerly with Vogel's Minstrels, to render the illustrated songs for the remainder of the Avenue picture season.

The Princess Amusement Company offered one of the most notable successes in the local show world during the past month, at The Orpheum last week, in the recent Lubin release, "Their Only Son." The film portrays a highly dramatic tale and made a tremendous hit with Orpheum patrons. "An Indian's Appreciation," a semi-tragic, with elaborate scenics, also made good.

The Casino, operated by the Princess Amusement Company, specialized in Western photoplays last week, with distinct success. One of the week's films, "The Two-Gun Man," scored a tremendous success and another, "An Indian Maid's Sacrifice," proved to be equally as appealing.

Joseph Steurle, Henry Reiss, Fred Dolle, Herman Goecke and other well-known local picture show proprietors, forming the Broadway and other amusement companies, recently announced that plans are now being prepared for the erection of a $30,000 permanent show house to replace the Baxter airdome on the Bardstown Road, near Transit Avenue, in the Highlands residence district. Architect Ostrander is in charge of the work, and will have the blue-prints ready for the Building Inspector in the very near future. The new theater is to be equipped with every modern convenience and will cover a space 60 by 150 feet in dimensions. This is the second $30,000 theater arranged for by the Broadway capitalists during the past fortnight, as Architect Ostrander recently filed plans for the erection of a similar structure on the Ideal airdome site at Twenty-sixth and Market Streets, work upon which is to be begun at once.

The Open Air Amusement Company, at Russellville, Ky., opened an up-to-date and attractive airdome on Harrison Avenue, in that city, for a mid-summer run, a short time ago. The house has been drawing capacity audiences and bids fair to become a permanent institution. Mendel R. Perry is manager of the new Russellville show.

Trigg & Goldbaum, picture men of New York City, have sent the pictures of the recent Battling Nelson-Owen Moran fight pictures on circuit through Tennessee. The Bonita, in Chattanooga, and the Grand, in Nashville, were among the first Tennessee houses to secure the fistic portrayals, and succeeded remarkably with them, finding the public willing to pay 10 cents admission instead of the standard rate of 5 cents.

The Grand Theater, "Where Everybody Goes," was opened last week in Knoxville, Tenn., for a run of vaudeville, interspersed with motion pictures. Five acts of vaudeville, mixed with three film exhibitions, and an illustrated song, furnish an interesting program for 10 cents. Three shows are given daily. "The Return of Widow Pogson's Husband," a convulsing Vitagraph release of recent date, is pronounced to have scored the biggest hit made by a comic in Knoxville for many a day.

"Mutt & Jeff at the Fortune Teller's," kept the ball rolling and gate receipts swelled at The Gay Theater in Knoxville Tenn. last week. The Gay proprietors are featuring the popular productions of Bud Fisher as seen in photoplay and predict that the month's run will be the best in the history of the establishment, as the result of the big and little fellow's popularity. IN THE MISSISSIPPI VALLEY.

The Princess, at Peoria, Ill., recently staged Pathe's Faust with two prominent organists at the pipe organ, which is a feature of this well-conducted house.

C. J. Law and Roy Bess have dissolved partnership as proprietors of the Palace Theater, at Nokomis, Ill., and Mr. Law is now sole owner. Miss Geneva McCaslin is the new singer and Miss Lucy Elliott, pianist.

The Gem Theater, at Beardstown, Ill., has installed a new stage and the interior has beeu redecorated.

J. L. Fogarty, of Collinsville, Ill., has leased the Opera House at Sandoval, Ill., and will operate a picture show there. P. N. Maloney, of St. Louis, will be operator.

The Dreamland Theater, at Galena, Ill., has installed a new advertising curtain and a daylight screen. White Slave pictures shown here, were passed by the city officials.

Church services are held each Sunday night at the Airdome, Taylorville, Ill., a feature of which are illustrated sermons and illustrated sacred songs.

A new stage given to the village hall at Lake Bluff, Ill., by J. J. Murdock recently, was dedicated by a performance at which pictures furnished by Mr. Murdock were shown.

J. L. Henderson, of Chicago, has taken over the Grand Opera House in Aurora, Ill.

The Kinodrome, at Rantoul, Ill., has been sold by Neal & Ray to E. E. Alger of Paxton, Ill., who already owns several photoplay houses. A raised floor, opera chairs, a new front and improved ventilation, come with the new management. It will be known as the Crystal.

Fred Law, of Nokomis, Ill., will put $18,000 into the construction of his new building at Pana, Ill. It will be a two-story business block, with an up-to-date theater in the center.

Chauncey Grimm will open a moving picture show at Gibson City, Ill.

William and Lee Carroll, proprietors of the Majestic, at Jacksonville, Ill., have put in a new steel ceiling, redecorated the front and interior and remodeled the front.

C. F. Roland, formerly manager of the New Roland Theater, at Marion, Ill., has opened a moving picture show in Henderson, Ky.

Mrs. Al R. Triechel, pianist at the Gem Theater, in Mt. Carmel, Ill., recently was drowned in the Wabash River near that city, where she had gone bathing with her husband.

"All pictures shown will be censured," remarks B. L. T., in The Chicago Tribune, speaking of the advertising of the Princess Theater, Monticello, Ia. "The word seems to be fixed in the vocabulary of the jitney show proprietor."

The Princess, a motion picture show at Pittsfield, Ill., has opened for business. F. H. M.

TEMPLE, TEX.

Exchange Opera House, Ensor and Honeycutt, managers, closed for the season.

Majestic No. 1, Frank Lucas, manager, closed for the season. Will re-open in the fall with pictures and vaudeville.

Majestic No. 2, Frank Lucas, manager, songs and pictures to good business . This popular place of amusement continues to build up its standard of policy by securing pictures (Licensed) a day or so after released.

Colonial, Carr and Woodall, managers, songs and pictures. Business is very good. This house recently changed from Association to Independent. "Mutt and Jeff" a specialty.

Airdome, Vogel and Samuels, managers, the managers recently closed their place on account of unsatisfactory business.

HARRISBURG, PA.

Mr. and Mrs. A. F. Branka, of the Photoplay Film Exchange, gave a reception in honor of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Settino, of New York, who are honeymooning through the Keystone State. Mr. Settino is connected with one of New York's moving picture repair shops.

James George, manager of the Victoria Theater, is contemplating embarking in the poultry business as a side line in the near future. He is about to close a deal for several incubatora of a large capacity.

Managers Adams and Fry will close the Star Theater for remodeling. They will remove the step and lower the entrance so as to make it on a level with the sidewalk, raise the ceiling of the lobby and re-decorate the interior.

Manager Miller, of the Summit, featured the Passion Play Tuesday, Aug. 15, to a large and appreciative audience.

R. Carpenter, manager of the Photoplay Exchange, of York, Pa., and wife were business visitors in our city.

Harry Kipple, former operator at the Photoplay, goes to Altoona, Pa., where he will operate at the New Theater, which is to open Aug. 16.

Ralph Bearley, of Baltimore, Md., is assistant operator at the Victoria Theater.

A local manager (name suppressed by request) expects to give a private demonstration of his invention of talking pictures in the very near future and has kindly invited the correspondent of the Moving Picture World to be on the job. I am therefore in hopes of sending in an accurate report in the near future.

Dr. Thos. H. A. Stites, of the Division of Tuberculosis Dispensaries of the State of Pennsylvania, is giving a number of illustrated lectures on tuberculosis in various parts of the State.

I. Silverman, of Altoona, Pa., has returned to Harrisburg after an absence of one week and is now in harness again managing the Photoplay Theater.

The Casino, located on Chestnut Street near Third, is again dark for reasons unknown. Why this theater should not prove a winner has been a question to the minds of many, yet it seems to be a dead one, so far as the making of money is concerned. It is hoped that some wideawake, live-wire manager of New York, or any old town, will take hold of this house and make it pay. The seating capacity of the Casino is the largest in the city and by proper management it should prove a profitable investment.

Nothing considerable in the World regarding "Operators and Some Operators," permit me to call attention to the fact that Harrisburg, Pa., has a number of first class operators—not mere crank turners. For instance, I refer to "Big Jack" at the Victoria; he is in a class by himself, being an old timer on the road, a member of the I. A. T. S. E. and I. B. E. W.; pulls off many surprising stunts from time to time. Then there is Brother Filson, of the Lyric, who is also entitled to the degree of "professor of cinematograph." He likewise is an I. A. T. S. E. man and knows what to do and how to do it, yet I will not claim that they can run any old film no matter how bad it may be without a break and, with all due respects to Chas. H. Sisson, of Penn Yan, N. Y., I am from Missouri when it comes to running any old film through a machine without a break, and as steady as a clock—for some clocks are not very steady.

Rife's Summer Garden draws large crowds nightly with free pictures, Mr. Rife having installed a new No. 6 Powers machine and running Independent pictures, changing program nightly.

The State Medical Society of Pennsylvania will hold its annual convention in this city September 25, 26, 27 and 28. Special illustrated lectures interspersed with special moving pictures will be included in the program.

The Dauphin County Medical Society is contemplating arranging for a series of motion picture lectures for the coming winter season.

Maxwell H. Hite, the pioneer operator, will give his monthly entertainment at the Dauphin County Almhouse and Mt. Alto Sanitarium next week. Mr. Hite is arranging to extend his charity work to other institutions in the near future.

M. H. H.

NEW ENGLAND.

Manager White, of the Music Hall, Taunton, Mass., is very much occupied this summer, as he is completely renovating and refitting his theater, which he hopes to open Labor Day. It is of interest to note that the Music Hall is the oldest theater in Taunton, having been built in 1869.

The Palace Theater, Fall River, Mass., has closed. This house has been owned and managed by George Graham. Before the house was taken over by Mr. Graham, Independent pictures were used. Mr. Graham tried the Licensed product, and with success. This summer a stock company was holding forth and did not meet expectations. The immediate future of the Palace is uncertain.

S. Z. Poli has started work on his new theater at Bridgeport, Conn. The house is to replace the one lost last spring by Mr. Poli, through fire. "Pop" vaudeville and pictures are to be used, and the house is positively to be a magnificent theater, as the plans show.

Emil Gerstle, until recently manager of the Congress Hall Theater, Portland, Maine, has left that position. Manager Gerstle has been placed in charge of the Scenic Theater, Waltham, Mass. This house is one of the William Bradstreet circuit of theaters devoted to Licensed service, vaudeville and illustrated songs. It had been rumored that Mr. Gerstle was about to manage a Providence, R. I., theater, but this is incorrect.

The Olympia Theater, Lynn, is rapidly approaching completion. Labor Day will see the opening of this theater; not only one of the largest theaters in this country devoted to "pop" vaudeville and pictures, but also one of the most magnificent and up-to-date. Thirty-two hundred is the seating capacity.

Col. William G. Stanton, manager of the Central square Theater, Lynn, Mass., showing pictures and vaudeville, had an idea which packed his house solid for three days. Col. Stanton engaged W. P. Connery, son of the Mayor of Lynn, to perform at the theater. Crowded houses were the result. The Central Square is doing excellently.

J. J. Flynn's Sabbatia Park, Taunton, Mass., which has been presenting musical comedy attractions thus far this summer, has given up that form of amusement. Licensed pictures and vaudeville are now being used, and the Park will fill out the remainder of the season under this regime. Manager George I. Appleby, of the Star Theater, Boston, Mass., is attending to the booking of the pictures for Mr. Flynn.

Sheedy's Theater, Holyoke, Mass., opened for the new season August 14, with a new manager at the helm, in the person of Mr. F. J. Starr. Manager Starr was in charge of the Park Theater, Manchester, N. H. Sheedy's Holyoke theater was always one of the best houses on the Sheedy circuit.

Harold F. Jackson, manager of the Bijou Theater, Fitchburg, Mass., is now being prominently mentioned as a candidate for Representative. Readers of these columns will not be surprised at this, as on several occasions it has been recorded that Manager Jackson was a high-class motion picture man, and that his aim was to elevate his theater.

Glover Ware, member of the firm of Ware Brothers, operating the Dreamland Theater, Beverly, Mass., was in New York City and viewed the Coronation pictures as presented by Kinemacolor at the Herald Square Theater. "Wonderful," and "true to life," are two of the phrases used by Mr. Glover to the writer, when expressing himself as to the merits of the product of the Kinemacolor Company.

BOSTON.

Marcus Loew has at last given out the exact date upon which the Columbia Theater will be opened under the Loew regime of "pop" vaudeville and pictures. Aug. 21 is the date. This is the house Mr. Loew acquired from Messrs. Farren & Edwards, through foreclosure proceedings. Mr. Hamilton is to manage the Columbia.

V. J. Morris, manager of Marcus Loew's Orpheum Theater, is the latest manager connected with motion pictures, to become a philanthropist. Mr. Morris was the last of 75 young folks from the Helping Hand Temporary Home for Destitute Hebrew Children, who attended a matinee performance at the Orpheum, and viewed an exeellent program of vaudeville and pictures.

Edward C. Kelley, a well known vaudeville agent, died in this city on July 27. Mr. Kelley hooked vaudeville acts for many vaudeville and picture houses.

Manager Delmore, of the Howard Theater, has installed a new Powers No. 6.

Local motion picture people were much surprised to find that General Manager F. G. Collier, of the Old South and New Washington Theaters, had changed the film service used in these houses, from Independent to Licensed. The Old South and Washington Theaters have been very stanch friends of the Independent product until this date.

It has been some weeks—or, rather, some months, since any reel released by the Patents Company, has received so favorable a welcome as was granted the "Battle of Bunker Hill," a recent Edison release. Every house in Boston, using Licensed reels, exhibited this reel. At the Unique, Pastime, Old South, Beacon, Star and Globe theaters, the picture was run as a first-run reel. Big houses have been drawn by this reel, and it looks as if this would continue for some time.

Finally the future policy of the New National Theater has been announced. The house will open early in September, and will exhibit trust pictures and Keith vaudeville. Price will be 5c, 10c and 15c. This house was practically ready for opening just one year ago, but some faulty construction work held up the opening. B. F. Keith acquired the house from the Gordon Brothers Amusement Company, of Worcester, while the house was in the process of erection. The National seats 4,500 people, and is probably the largest house in the world devoted to "pop" vaudeville and pictures. Because of its great size, much doubt has arisen as to the quality of the projection.

JACKSONVILLE, FLA.

Owing to other interests demanding his entire time, R. W. Chambers withdrew as manager of the Savoy Theater, the leading Independent house of the city, and P. T. Kontos, the largest stockholder of the Savoy Company, assumed control.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

A new film company has made its bow to the moving picture world in general and the Capital City in particular. This is known as the Feature Film Company, with H. M. Crandall as president and treasurer, and Sig. G. Boernstein, as vice-president and general manager. The company is located on Ninth Street, and although it is beginning quietly, it expects to do something big in the fall, when it will be ready to make an announcement in big letters. Mr. Boernstein will be remembered as being operator and manager of the Capital Film Company of this city, a corporation which no longer exists as an active body; while Mr. Crandall is a live exhibitor here, and manages one of our prettiest and most up-to-date airdomes, known as La Grand. With a business man and a film artist so well combined, the Feature Film Company has a favorable outlook. A catchy motto, "Every film a feature," has been adopted by the corporation.

The second of the Fort Meyer pictures by the Solax Company, entitled, "An Enlisted Man's Honor," called forth as much enthusiasm as the other of this series. This reel was presented on the day of release at the Empress. The famous Fifteenth Cavalry was on the screen more prominently than in the previous photoplay. Many of these horsemen were in the audience and thoroughly enjoyed the show.

The Kinemacolor Coronation pictures made their initial bow at the National Capital on August 13 and remained a week at the Belasco Theater, one of our first class houses for drama, giving two performances daily. This is indeed a triumph in photography and art, and has created quite a sensation here.

ST. LOUIS.

The Vitagraph Monthly Events proved a huge success at all the leading downtown photoplay houses this week, the feature being that of a head on collision of two locomotives. Several other exciting events are pictured in these films.

The Lyric will hereafter show a special Florence Lawrence film each Saturday for the benefit of the ladies who are greatly delighted by the clever acting of Miss Lawrence.

The Hippodrome Theater, being erected at 6th and Walnut Streets by Frank L. Talbot, is well under way and will be completed at an early date. From present indications the Hippodrome will be one of the best constructed houses in the West. Everything is steel and concrete. It will be a two-story affair and will seat ahont 2,000 persons. Mr. Talbot announces that the opening will be about Oct. 1.

O. S.

BETHLEHEM, PA.

The Gem Theater, under the management of Fred Eddinger, running Wednesday and Saturday evenings, will, beginning next month, be open every evening, with a special matinee Saturdays.

The Victor, opened last winter, is a very cozy house, and runs three reels of Independent pictures; a drummer and pianist furnish the music; the projection is excellent. Herman Buraks is manager.

The National Theater, of which A. Tocce is proprietor, is one of the best equipped houses in Eastern Pennsylvania. Four reels of Licensed films are run and the operator is to be complimented for his good work.

SO. BETHLEHEM, PA.

A new theater is being erected on Fourth Street at a cost of $40,000. It will be one of the finest in this section. Some of the leading business men are stockholders. Licensed films and vaudeville will form the program.

The Palace Theater, one of the largest places in town, is closed for the summer months. The interior is being remodeled, and the house will reopen on Labor Day. Albert Longo is the manager.

The Breeze, which is an open air theater, is situated among the residential section of the town, and with a seating capacity of 1,200 does a land office business. The projection at this house could be improved upon, and the pictures are badly marred by the rays of a street are light.

The Bijou is one of a chain of houses owned by Rothleder, Schwalm & Blacker, which has made a name for itself for its good projection. Arthur Blacker, the manager, has been identified with the moving picture business for a number of years, and offers the public three reels of Licensed films, doing a good business the year round.

The Pastime, one of the oldest theaters in town, is under the capable management of J. G. Bellen. The theater is unique, and is a complete and entire departure from the ordinary: when darkness permits, the curtain is raised and the pictures are shown in the open. The open air addition extends fifty feet from the theater and is well equipped. The result is that business has been greatly improved for the summer months. Three reels of new Independent pictures are shown, and the good work of the pianist adds effect to the pictures.

GIVING THE HIGH SIGN TO WOMEN HATERS (Aug. 26).—Nicodemus, the philosopher of Athens, teaches the men to despise women and scorn love. In connection with his lectures he introduces the sign language, by which it becomes unnecessary for them to even speak with women, but possible to make known their version to the fair sex by a few simple movements of the hands. When the women find themselves completely ignored by the youths of the city and even by the gray bearded men they plan an indignation meeting and consider a campaign, whereby they avenge themselves upon the philosopher.

Armed with presents they go to the philosopher and beg of him the privilege of hearing his marvelous philosophy, and flattered by their request Nicodemus acceeds to it Man is not made of wool and philosophers are only human after all; so it is not long before he falls in love with his charming pupils, and finally when he is discovered making love to Helen he promises to renounce his former doctrines and marry her.

Scene from Gaumont's Release, "Giving the High Sign to Woman Haters."

After Nicodemus has publicly proclaimed the magic power of love he is scorned by his former pupils and learns to his cost that the wisest philosophy is to "Practise what you preach."

JIMMIE TO THE RESCUE (Aug. 29).—Jimmie and Toto are next door neighbors. Toto is motherless and lives with a grouchy father. Jimmie is blessed with a father and mother who look on him as the apple of their eyes.

One morning Toto's father is particularly unkind to her. Jimmie learns of it and invites her to have breakfast with him.

In the meantime the father returns and flies into a rage when he discovers Toto is the guest of his neighbors.

Jimmie is equal to the occasion He plans a meeting with Toto at midnight when they will be safe from prying eyes. Their attics are adjacent and when the hour has tolled we catch sight of Jimmie's head as the attic window is raised. Soon Toto is seen. He requests her to await his return with the necessary ropes for their descent to the street. It is a novel sight to see the young people descend for three stories by means of a rope, an athletic feat that will make many wonder. They gain the sidewalk and hurry off in search of a clergyman, for Jimmie is bent upon marrying Toto and so relieving her of the necessity of living with her crabbed father.

They find the home of some high dignitaries of the church where Jimmie's manliness so pleases the good brothers that they serve refreshments to the children, after which the rector accompanies them to their homes.

Here they find that Toto's father has been taken into custody by the police, and Jimmie's parents kindly make a place for her under their roof.

THE SON OF THE SHUNAMMITE (Aug. 19).—Scene 1—The Shunammite and her aged husband. Scene 2—Elisha, the prophet, on a visit to Shunem, meets the woman, who gives him shelter and food. Scene 3—And Elisha sends Gehazi, his servant, to learn what he can do to repay the woman for her kindness. Scene 4—Gehazi reports that the woman prays for a child. And Elisha prophesies that a son will be born to her. Scene 5—And according to Elisha's prophesy a son is born. He prospers for ten years. While visiting his father in the fields the child is overcome by the heat. Scene 6—He is taken to his mother and dies in her arms. Scene 7—The mother places him upon the bed of Elisha, the prophet, and leaves him there. Scene 8—Seeking out the prophet she vows she will not leave him until he restores her child. Scene 9—Elisha prays for the restoration of life to the boy. Scene 10—And the child is restored.

IN THE SHADOW OF THE PINES (Aug. 28).—Major John Hampden Gordon, of the Royal Yorkshire Fusiliers, was shot through the lung at Waterloo and left for dead on the field. He was found by some ghoulish peasants of Hougoumont and saved. His English doctor ordered him to the balsamic airs of the Canadian pine forests, and he came to the trading post of James Anderson, a Scotch fur trader who had married a half blood Mississauga woman, and had a daughter, Elspeth, of great beauty. She nursed the Major to health, and they loved deeply and eternally. His father refused his consent to what he termed a mesalliance and the Major, forfeiting all claim to his estates, showed his appreciation and love for Elspeth by marrying her.

A NEW YORK COWBOY (Aug. 29).—Harry Swift, a young New Yorker, visits the Langley's third ranch. He immediately falls in love with pretty Belle Langley, his host's daughter, who is loved by two cowboys, "Red" Roberts and "Brownie."

The boys dislike Harry and they put up some games on him. When Harry goes to his room to dress for a dance he finds that the boys have borrowed all of his clothes. The dance on a platform in the picturesque Roaring River country is a unique and interesting scene.

Harry steals the cowboy's chaps and it is a queer looking outfit that presents itself to the "Boss" when the boys report for work next day, dressed in evening coats, Tuxedoes, and Harry's fancy suits.

Then the boys take Harry to town and get him drunk. The game goes wrong when Harry goes on the rampage, shoots up the place, and chases the cowboys with two guns.

The boys get mad and write a letter to Harry telling him to get out before noon or they will land him. Harry stays and the cowboys proceed to carry out their threat. Belle finds the threatening note and rides to Harry's rescue. She comes just in time. Harry is about to be strung up at the end of a rope when Belle rides in and with one shot from her revolver severs the rope. Then that gun sends some lead toward the lynching committee, and they scatter in a hurry. Belle concludes that Harry will be safer as her affianced husband.

THROUGH FIRE AND SMOKE (Aug. 31).—Tom, the handsome fireman, and Betty, the factory girl, are keeping company. En route to work one morning, Betty meets the manager of her department, and they proceed to the factory together. Betty is pleased by the attention of her manager.

When Herbert and Betty reach their department, he lingers beside her machine a moment, and as he leaves he brushes against the freshly painted trash can, which leaves a trace on his coat. He goes to the storeroom to repair the damage with gasoline, and lighting the gas he gets busy with the coat. He is called into the workroom and forgets to cover the bottle or to turn out the gas. There is an explosion so severe as to demolish the door and break the windows.

Pandemonium reigns supreme; the terrified girls rushing madly for the stairway. The windows seem the only means of escape, since the elevator shaft and stairway are enveloped in flames, and one girl after another drops to serious injury or certain death.

Betty finds a rope, and here Herbert shows his yellow streak by grabbing it from her and rushing to the window to save himself.

Tom's engine house gets the first alarm, his mind full of Betty and bent upon saving her if possible, his ladder is the first to be raised. The fire rages fast and furious. Finally Betty sees him, and rushing to him he carries her down the ladder to safety.

The next day Herbert who has escaped unharmed, comes to Betty's home to offer apologies for his unfeeling and mad haste to save himself, and is met by the hero Tom, who makes no ceremony of throwing him out.

THE SURGEON'S TEMPTATION (Aug. 29).—Norman Marsden, an eminent surgeon, becomes engaged to Cecelia West. Marsden introduces her to his companion, Evans, and they fall in love at once. Evans impresses upon Cecelia that it is he whom she loves and not Marsden. She tells Marsden this and they part.

While Evans is driving his auto one day, his car is overturned, and he is taken to the hospital, where it is found that he has a fractured skull. There is only one surgeon who can do the job and he is Marsden. But when he recognizes his patient he pauses for a moment, then goes to work like a man. His life is saved. When Evans is out of the hospital he tells Marsden that he is sorry for taking his loved one, and will leave her, but Marsden, knowing that Evans really loves Cecelia leaves them together for the rest of their lives.

BETTY'S BUTTONS (Aug 30).—Betty, a poor little girl, whose father has been out of work for some time, appears at school in a dress that is far from being up to the standard of the other little girls. They poke fun at her in an innocent sort of way, but it breaks her heart and when she comes home she demands a new dress. Unfortunately it is just before rent day and there is no money to be spared, so her mother makes up her mind that she will cut down one of her own dresses to provide Betty with a new one. And so it comes that at school the next day Betty appears with her new dress, down the front of which are four big buttons. The children admire the dress very much, but one little mischief counts off the buttons and discovers that by the telling "rich man, poor man, beggar man, thief" Betty's future is to be inevitably connected with a thief.

Meanwhile the rent collector has called at the house and taken the last money that her father and mother had for expenses, but in putting it into his pocket he accidentally drops a twenty dollar bill on the floor. He is unconscious of this, but Betty's father sees it and puts his foot on it so that it is hid when the collector leaves the house. As the latter opens the door Betty dashes in, her small heart utterly broken at the idea of being connected with a thief. She tells the story to her little mother and father, the latter standing the while with one foot upon the twenty dollar bill. Of course the word "thief" from his little daughter's lips brings him to a sudden realization of where he stands and to the surprise of the mother and daughter, the father suddenly stoops, picks up something from the floor which they do not see, and seizing his hat, dashes from the room, leaving them staring after him in open eyed amazement. Arriving at the office of the rent collector, where the loss has just been noticed he presents the twenty dollar bill and tells the man that he dropped it on his floor. Now it so happens that the office needed help and that the father's honesty in returning the money when they know well enough that it is hard for him to get such an amount in his present circumstances, make him seem a good candidate for the position which is promptly offered him.

THE SILENT TONGUE (Aug. 30).—Bob, a precocious young man, after touring the world for ten years and feeling the responsibilities of life, having had many wide and varied experiences, decides to return home and accordingly writes a letter to that effect and among other things, mentions that he is tired of giddy society girls who talk, talk, talk and emphatically says that he will never marry until he finds the girl with the silent tongue.

His uncle, a retired merchant with a jovial disposition, shows the letter to his daughter Dorothy, a most attractive young lady, whom Bob has not seen since her childhood days. At first she is inclined to resent what Bob says in his letter, but on second thought she decides that a little trick to relieve him of his self-confidence would not at all be bad; her father agrees with her, promising to aid her in carrying out her little joke. She then procures an ear trumpet and upon Bob's arrival pretends to be very deaf and quite dumb.

In due time Bob arrives, sees a portrait on the wall of his uncle's freckled-face little daughter, as he knew her, inquires about her and is informed that a recent illness left her deaf and dumb.

When Bob meets the young lady instead of a freckled-face girl he sees before him a beautiful young miss. So fascinated is he with her beauty that he forthwith falls head over heels in love with her. But how lamentable that she is deaf and dumb and how laughable are the fruitless struggles and trials he has with the ear trumpet, making him unhappy and sad, while she is bubbling over with glee at his discomfiture. Finally, however, the tables turn; during one of her unguarded moments while holding an animated conversation with her father. Bob overhears her and is almost struck dumb himself; quickly recovering, he slips up beside her, catching her in the act of speaking quite fluently.

The joke is now on her and her perplexity and embarrassment make her all the more beautiful to him, and finding that his love is reciprocated he takes advantage of the opportune moment and the happy day is named.

ECLIPSE.

FOR THE HONOR OF THE NAME (Aug. 16).—The Elder Darney dismisses his clerk, Louis Barry, for carelessness.

Young Darney marries his father's stenographer in spite of the old man's protests, and is disowned.

Two years later—Young Darney out of work and funds, tries to borrow money from Barry.

Barry will loan only on Elder Darney's guarantee. This is refused.

The youth now forges his father's name, and Barry knowing the deception, accepts the spurious guarantee, thinking to avenge himself upon his former employer.

For the honor of his name, Darney, senior, ac-

A KING FOR AN HOUR (Aug. 30).—William, a cobbler, is frequently a customer at the roadside inn. One day, as William is freely indulging in spirits, the Duke of Padua, and his courtiers, resolve to play a good joke upon him.

They follow him when he leaves the inn, and wait till he falls asleep on the bank of the river. Then the Duke's retainers take William to the Ducal palace, where he is dressed in court costume and placed in the Duke's bed.

When he awakes, crowned, he believes himself to be dreaming, and a banquet that follows helps to intensify this idea. When he again falls into a sound sleep, he is dressed in his old clothes and taken to the bank of the river. When he awakes and sees the Duke and his courtiers laughing, he asks an explanation, and is heartily pleased by the joke. He then returns to his cobbler's shop, happily thinking that liberty is better than court etiquette.

SIGHTS OF BERLIN (Aug. 30).—Glimpses of the old city—The Quay; old houses; narrow and quaint streets; old arch and ruins.

Modern Berlin—Bridge across the river and traffic under and over; up-to-date shipping; trains and overhead railways; the Bradenburg Gate.

Park Entrance—Public buildings; Reichstag; Avenue of Victory; Statuary.

The Imperial Palace—Panoramic view of buildings; monuments; fountains and general surroundings.

Military Scenes—Changing the guard at the Royal Palace; the band; old bridge and surroundings.

PATHE.

THE RANCH IN FLAMES (Aug. 28).—Pedro has been discharged by the colonel, the owner of the ranch, and he and his wife find themselves in desperate straits for the rent. Finally his wife decides to try her hand at raising the money and disguising herself as a man she holds up the stage. She escapes the posse sent in pursuit of the highwayman by turning her horse loose and changing back to woman's attire. Her husband finds the horse and the stolen goods just as the posse see him. Of course he is suspected, tried, and about to be hung when a fire breaks out at the ranch house.

FOR THE SAKE OF THE TRIBE (Aug. 30).—Three thieves in the Western bad lands make up as Indians and rob the Government storehouse, killing the sentry on guard in doing so. The nearby Indian tribe is suspected and the officer in command of the army post tells them that unless the culprits are surrendered to the Provost Guard he will not give them any more rations. This is an awful threat in that country and in consequence three innocent Indians volunteer to give themselves up to death to save the tribe from starvation. While these Indians are digging graves for themselves under guard, the real robbers have a quarrel, which results in one giving the others away. All ends happily.

THE MEDICINE WOMAN (Aug. 31).—The daughter of the chief of a tribe meets a brave from a neighboring nation and falls in love with him. Her father gives her to another suitor, who starts with her to his home. On the way the unhappy girl appeals to a medicine woman, who gives her a magic feather, which produces death to the disappointed lover; she gives another feather of life. Just before the marriage ceremony the maiden uses the feather of death and is buried. After her burial her real lover steals the body and using the feather of life restores her to life and to himself.

THE THUMB PRINT (Sept. 1).—Abe Case, postmaster in a small Western town, and Jack Plympton are rivals for the hand of Helen Mowbry. She readily consents to become the wife of Jack. This arouses the hatred of Case against the lucky man. He awaits his chance to get square with him, and it comes when Jack is called East. During his absence, she is awaiting to hear from him, which she would have done had not Abe taken Jack's letters. Abe begins to press his suit and urges Helen to marry him, assuring her that Jack has proven false to her.

Helen marries him and shortly after their honeymoon, Martini, an Italian miner whom Abe had staked and gone into partnership with, strikes it rich and loses no time in telling his partner of their lucky strike. Case swindles the poor Italian out of his share and decamps from the town. Helen and her husband go East, where they live in style and luxury.

One night at a reception she meets Jack, her old sweetheart. He is surprised to find her married to the ex-postmaster, finds out the villainy and treachery of her husband. Her old love for Jack is as strong as ever; they accuse Case of his contemptible deception and he, in the most cold-blooded matter of fact way, proposes to toss a coin to determine to whom Helen belongs. The coin is tossed and Jack loses.

Case has not accounted with Martini, who awaits to be revenged. His day of reckoning comes, with a pair of scissors, through a curtain behind which Case is standing in his own home, Martini stabs his dishonest partner and escapes unseen. Helen, on account of her love for Jack, is arrested on suspicion of having killed her husband. She is taken to court, tried and exonerated by the finger mark expert, when the finger marks on the shears are compared with her own. She is now at liberty to marry the man whom she has always loved.

THE CARROT CATERPILLAR (Sept. 1).—A very remarkable film showing how the carrot caterpillar lives, then seems to die, forming a chrysalis. In this form the caterpillar lies dormant all winter and in the spring it comes out a butterfly.

A DAUGHTER OF THE SOUTH (Sept. 2).—A story of the Civil War, with both the North and the South sharing the honors. A girl of the Southland loves a Confederate and she is loved in turn by a Union officer. The story is too original to spoil by the telling, but this may be known. The girl scorns the love of the Northerner and the Southern boy gets into trouble and is finally saved by the Federal officer.

BIOGRAPH.

THE DIVING GIRL (Aug. 21).—With her uncle she visits the seashore and goes bathing with a party of her brother's friends. Uncle also takes a dip and is annoyed at the perilous performance of the girl. He orders her from the water and locks her in her room, but brother releases her. He finally concludes that home is the best place for her, for there she will run no chance of drowning.

$500 REWARD (Aug. 21).—A burglar enters the home of a wealthy man and steals a valuable necklace. A reward of $500 is offered for the thief's apprehension. A couple of rube detectives start out to find the robber and succeed in taking into custody the victim of the robbery and the real detective who is on the case. An ordinary copper gets the thief and wins the reward.

THE ROSE OF KENTUCKY (Aug. 24).—The little girl, having lost her mother by death, would have been a homeless orphan had not the generous natured planter adopted her. He sends her to school, and as he watches her progress he also realizes a growing interest in her that digs deep into his heart. Feeling that he is too old to be her husband, he encourages her interest in his partner, who is a younger man. But she, in spite of the planter's efforts at concealing his love, appreciates the fact that he is making a sacrifice for her welfare, as he sees it. However, she herself loves her benefactor, and is given an opportunity to reject the younger man, as he shows the yellow streak, when the night riders attack the planter's tobacco barns.

KALEM.

THE BRANDED SHOULDER (Aug. 28).—Clay Barton, a poor young ranchman, decides to leave his motherless baby in a foundling asylum for adoption and that he may recognize it again in later years he decides to brand the baby's shoulder. The branded baby is adopted and named Lillian by the Winthrops, a wealthy couple who have recently lost their little child, with the understanding that the father is not to know where it goes. Twenty years later an accident to Lillian Winthrop's automobile brings about a meeting with Ivor Thaine. Eventually Lillian and young Thaine are betrothed much to the displeasure of Jessica Jurdy, Mr. Winthrop's niece and ward, who has developed more than a liking for Lillian's sweetheart. A few days after the betrothal Mr. Winthrop succumbs to an attack of heart disease and as no will is found Lillian is supposed to inherit the entire estate. Jessica while searching her uncle's desk shortly after the funeral finds a letter indicating that the adoption of Lillian was not legal. She consults a lawyer and learns that Lillian cannot inherit the property.

Clay Barton, who is now wealthy, seeing an advertisement of the sale of the Winthrop estate, decides to bid in the property, knowing it is the home of his daughter, having obtained through a clerk of the foundling asylum a record of the adoption. Arriving at the Winthrop home the day of the sale Clay learns of Lillian's true situation and quickly makes his claims known. Young Thaine shows his manhood by reiterating his love for Lillian, although the Winthrop property is not to be hers.

BUILDING THE NEW LINE (Aug. 30).—Carl Wells, son of the president of the Midland Electric, just graduated from college decides he would like to try work for a change. Mrs. Wilson, a young widow, objects to an electric road across her ranch. Two weeks later the widow returning from a visit finds the construction gang at work and stops them. The president wires the construction boss to get busy, but the widow refuses to recognize the majesty of the law. The president wires his son to try his hand at settling matters and young Wells and the widow become friends. Wells plans to outwit the widow and the plan is successful, but Wells finds no satisfaction in his success. Two weeks later there is a chance meeting and all is forgiven.

ON THE WARPATH (Sept. 1).—James Newcomb and Jim Ward, two old settlers seated in front of Newcomb's log cabin, are discussing their fights with the Indians when the cabin was first built. Bobbie Newcomb's nine-year-old son, listens with rapt attention. Going to the house and getting a gun, little Bobbie shows the old timers how he would defend the cabin from an Indian attack. The following day Dick Lathrope, a half-breed trapper, brings word that the Indians have arisen during the absence of the troops. Preparations for flight are made by Bobbie's parents. What household goods they can carry with the family are bundled into the prairie schooner and the team starts on the dead run for the nearest military post. Just as they are about to drive away from the cabin Bobbie throws out a gun and unseen by the other occupants of the wagon drops to the ground in his determination to stay behind and defend the cabin.

Shortly after the family drives away the Indians appear. Little Bobbie opens fire and beats a hasty retreat.

Safely arriving at the fort, the Newcombs discover Bobbie's absence. Dick Lathrope volunteers to go back for him and arrives in time to rescue Bobbie from a perilous situation.

ESSANAY.

THE PLAYWRIGHT (Aug. 29).—Frank Richardson is writing a play—his first play. Imbued with a feeling that his work is one of more than ordinary value and that great success awaits him when it is finished, he labors day and night, sometimes without eating or sleeping. His finances, however, have run low and he is one day awakened to the necessity of his earning at least enough to pay for his room and board. But the play is nearly finished and until he is turned out of his room and his typewriter taken from him, does he realize his position. He finishes the play on a park bench and with great confidence of its success, visits a theatrical manager. Here his reception is cold and he is turned down by the manager, who refuses to even look at the manuscript. He tries another one and in despair is again turned down. Undaunted, he returns to the first manager, but unable to see him, leaves the manuscript with a clerk, who, after the young man has departed, throws the manuscript into a waste basket. The manager, entering at the moment rescues the manuscript and glances through it. His interest is immediately aroused as, delighted, he realizes he has made a find. The young playwright, in the meantime, has fallen in a faint on the street and is rescued by a young lady and her mother, who give him a room in their house. The daughter and the playwright fall in love and a few days later they read a personal in the paper, advertising for Frank Richardson, author of "The Golden Age," whose play is to be produced. In delight, Richardson visits the office of the theatrical manager, who presents Richardson with a good sized check, advanced royalties on his play.

PUTTING IT OVER (Sept. 1).—George Moore, the celebrated impersonator, is in his dressing-room after his turn at the theater when he receives a card bearing the name Miss Gertrude Austin, and on the back of which is written the information that she will await him at the stage door. He finds her to be an exceptionally pretty girl and accepts her invitation to accompany her home. Arriving there he is introduced to her father, but the latter will have nothing to do with the actor and orders him out of the house. Moore goes, but promises Gertrude he will see her again and will call disguised as the chauffeur. In the costume he is found making love to the girl by her father, who, thinking that Moore is the chauffeur, discharges him. The next time Moore calls he is disguised as the gardener and the same scene is again enacted. The third time, however, Moore calls disguised as the butler and after fooling the old man until the latter is nearly out of his head, he tears off his disguise and shows who he is. The old man laughs in spite of himself and the young couple take advantage of his momentary good humor in making him promise to permit them to marry.

MISS CHATTERER'S EXPERIENCE (Sept. 1).—Miss Chatterer, a canvasser, is without funds to lay in a supply of the articles she sells and cleverly disguising several bars of laundry soap to look as though they were the more expensive perfumed article she sets out to make some money. Walking down the street she picks up a small package with an address of a city office building and goes there to return the package. But the surly owner of the package refuses to listen to her and after pushing her out throws the package out. The package contains a large number of big bills and Miss Chatterer, being hungry, visits a restaurant and orders a large supply of ham and eggs and ice tea, which she devours in a manner which amuses the waiters. When she leaves, however, she runs directly into the arms of a policeman and the owner of the money and is forced to accompany them to a station to explain why she did not give the man the money.

A WESTERN GIRL'S SACRIFICE (Sept. 2).—Young Harry Farman and Eloise Wendell are engaged to be married. Harry is a wealthy young fellow and Eloise is a society girl, and both find pleasure in their clubs and other such luxuries that the city affords the fashionable, wealthy set. Eloise, who has rode a hobby of philanthropy is engaged with her club and other clubs, who are holding a tag day, the funds to go to the children of the poor. Eloise, with another friend, invades a saloon in a fashionable hotel, and are invited to have a drink by two men seated at a table. Eloise, in fun, lifts the glass to her lips when Farman enters. The match is broken off and the next day Farman, with a friend, goes West. Here he employs his time in painting until an accident detains him. He is crushed under a fallen tree and carried to the cabin of the woodcutter, is tenderly cared for by the woodcutter's daughter. During his convalescence he becomes smitten by the rugged beauty and faithfulness of the girl and asks her to marry him. She consents and a few weeks later they are married. Months pass and as time flies by Farman thinks of the other girl and secretly longs for her. Eloise, in the meantime, has learned of the accident which has detained Harry and of his whereabouts. She goes to him. Katherine, Farman's wife, finds them together and realizing she cannot win back her husband's love, takes her life, begging Eloise to marry her husband.

LUBIN.

THE EASTERNER S SACRIFICE (Sept. 2).—Jack Chambers, society leader, goes West. He becomes a cowboy on the Austin ranch. He falls in love with Nell, the pretty daughter of his boss, and his admiration is returned.

Nell is devotedly attached to her brother Jim, a wild reckless youth who had left the ranch in anger, vowing never to return. She has gone all in her power to effect a reconciliation between the father and brother, but to no avail.

She receives a letter from Jim, stating that he must have five hundred dollars before the 25th of the month, or he will be arrested. Nell is wild crazed by the news.

It is now only a few days before the 25th, but no way in which to get the required amount has presented itself. Her brother must not go to jail. Nell is desperate.

Austin prepares to drive to town to bank money derived from the sale of cattle. A desperate plan forms in Nell's mind. She fights against it, but love for Jim conquers her. She will do it for his sake.

Nell changes her dress for a cowboy's suit. She makes a mask from an old felt hat and drives across the plains to wait for her father. When he arrives, he hears the command, "Hold up your hands!" Nell relieves him of his cash. She rides off in the opposite direction, and meets Jack, who is surprised at her attire, asks her what is the matter.

Nell then shows him Jim's letter. They exchange horses and Jack takes the chaps which she has been wearing and leaves her in English trousers. Jack rides back past the scene of the hold-up, and is met by Austin, who commands him to hold up his hands. Jack escapes while Austin forms a posse of cowboys, who ride out after him. They finally wound him and bring him back.

Nell overwhelmed with grief, explains that she was the thief. She shows Jim's letter to her father, who, finally won over by Nell's pleadings, forgives Jim and helps him.

Jack wins the love of this noblest girl and is later on married.

A GAY TIME IN WASHINGTON (Sept. 4).—George Clayton, not long married, pines for an old-time bachelor vacation. He tells his troubles to his pal, Harry Bunting, who lives in Washington. They fix up a fake telegram, stating that President Taft wishes George to dine with him. Harry sends this from Washington. "Mrs. C." is delighted with the honors thrust upon "her George."

George starts off in high glee. Harry meets him at the station, and they proceed to do the town up right. All would have gone well had not "Mrs. C." read in the paper that the President had not been in Washington for several weeks. George gets his when he arrives home again.

THE STORY OF ROSIE'S ROSE (Sept. 7).—Rosie Carter, while visiting at the home of Captain Brant, captivates Walter Allen and Jasper Lorne. She encourages both men in her flirtatious way, and causes jealousy between the two friends.

One day as they are preparing to leave on a long fishing trip, Rosie gives to each admirer a rose, telling that to the one still possessing her rose on his return, she will give a kiss.

Allen hides his rose. Lorne witnesses the act and steals Allen's rose and throws it overboard. He then takes out his rose and is looking at it when Allen, seeing him, goes to the hiding-place and discovers his loss. He accuses Lorne of the theft.

The two rivals are struggling when Captain Brant separates them, and orders them to take a net and go out into a dory, which they launch. The struggle starts anew and the boat upsets. Both men are thrown into the sea. Lorne catches hold of a log and clings to it while Allen breasting the waves, finally reaches shore.

He meets Rosie and tells her that Lorne has been drowned. Rosie, grief stricken, runs out upon the rocks scanning the water for signs of Lorne. Allen follows, pleading with her that it was not his fault, but she answers him with a look of scornful anger and runs away.

Captain Brant and his crew had sighted Lorne clinging to the log. They throw a line and he is pulled ashore. He tells them that Allen has been drowned, and when the boat reaches shore, they carry the news of Allen's supposed death to Mrs. Brant. Lorne, remorseful, goes out upon the rocks and grieves. Allen comes over the rocks and sees Lorne. Each take the other for a ghost and run away in terror, but they finally conquer their fear and come back and embrace each other. They walk down the shore and are met by the fisher folk, who rejoice at their safe return.

Rosie is sitting on the rocks heart-broken, Lorne and Allen appear. Allen approaches Rosie, offering her a rose. She throws it away, saying that she loves Lorne, who is dead. Allen then retreats and pushes Lorne towards Rosie. He takes her in his arms, while Allen steals out upon the rocks and sits looking sorrowfully at the rose in his hand.

FOUNTAIN OF YOUTH (Aug. 28).—Old Mr. Morton generally had the gout, toothache or some other ailment and he always had a most cantankerous temper, making things miserable for his devoted wife and his pretty daughter, Louise.

Young Jack Warner came one day to ask the consent of Mr. Morton to his daughter's marriage and was ordered out of the house by the tempestuous invalid.

The old gentleman was just enjoying his victory when he was dumbfounded to see his Satanic Majesty before him. "Follow me," said the vision, and in spite of his gout, Mr. Morton had to follow. Through the forest and up over the rocks of the mountain side Satan went, followed by the rheumatic Mortons, limping and growling. Up they went until they reached the Fountain of Youth. "Drink," said Satan. The old man drank and was immediately transformed into a child.

He joined into the children's games, stole jam from the pantry, etc.

But soon Satan ordered him to proceed, and the old gentleman was horrified to find that they soon arrived at the asylum. There he was locked in a cell and informed that this was his punishment for his irritability.

Just at this crisis Satan faded away, together with the walls of the cell and the old gentleman awakened full of thanks that it was only a dream. At once he called his family and gave his consent to the marriage and was so changed that nobody recognized him. But it was a change decidedly for the better.

THE SECRET (Aug. 28).—Because Jack Stanhope smelled cigarette smoke in his home one day he immediately became suspicious that he had a rival. It was only a few weeks after their honeymoon too.

Oh, the awful horror of thinking that some one else had taken his place in the affections of the one woman. He determined to be brave, though. His appeals to his wife for an explanation brought no satisfactory response. He must be a man and act as a man.

He hid himself and determined to see who the invader of his home was and kill him like a snake.

He hadn't long to wait and he heard his wife call the maid and then cautiously as Diana at her toilet she took from her maid's coiffure a package of cigarettes. With dainty fingers she lighted one and puffed at it daintily as some Eastern beauty in her garden.

ROMANCE OF POND COVE (Aug. 31).—When Arthur Moore's riches took wings and flew away, his fiancée, Ethel Earle, flew away also. She began accepting the attentions of Albert Conley and within a year they were married.

Arthur took his disappointment with manly fortitude. He found forgetfulness in work as any strong man would. All through his trouble he had the friendship of Ethel's younger sister, Flo, who was a beautiful and vivacious girl with sterling qualities.

A year later Arthur was chief engineer in charge of a large construction operation. It happened that Ethel, her father, mother and Flo were taking a trip in an automobile in that neighborhood. While the chauffeur was repairing a puncture Flo wandered away and came upon Arthur.

That young man had had time to heal his heart wounds and now Flo seemed in his eyes the most charming woman in the world. Ethel following in search of Flo found the two in earnest conversation. She ordered Flo back to the automobile, but Flo gayly told her to run along, that she was quite content where she was, and in the end the younger sister became Arthur's bride and very glad he was that his riches had disappeared and that Ethel had disappeared with them.

VITAGRAPH.

THE GENERAL'S DAUGHTER (Aug. 28).—During the war with the Mad Mahdi, General Dent, of the English Army, with his three daughters, is located in the Soudan. Flower, his youngest daughter, is her father's favorite. Mohammed Ahmed calls upon the general, and during his visit he espies Flower, who arouses in him the desire to make her one of his wives.

Mohammed Ahmed becomes a Mahdi, and incites the tribes of the country to revolt. General Dent leads his forces against the revolutionists, and during the terrific battle, in which all his men are killed, the general is taken to prison. During his imprisonment the Mahdi commands him to write a letter to his daughter Flower, telling her that he needs her presence, or he will die at the hands of his enemies. The general refuses. Mohammed writes a letter, requesting her to come to her father. Flower and her sisters make preparations to go. Flower, before leaving, places a revolver in her waist.

Arriving at the Mahdi's palace, the girls rush into their father's cell. While they are consulting with him, a veiled female enters the room, and Flower draws her pistol and compels the woman to exchange clothing with her. She passes the guard, mounts a horse, and dashes wildly across the sandy plains toward the English headquarters. On her way, she meets a regiment of Scottish Highlanders, tells of her father's capture and imprisonment, then leads them to the Mahdi's stronghold. In the meantime the girls lock the door and refuse the infuriated Mahdi admission. His servants try to batter down the door. The Kilties arrive just in time to route the Mahdi's horde of followers, restoring the general and his daughters to liberty.

The young colonel of the Highlanders falls in love with Flower, and she with him, and her father is not at all displeased.

THE WRONG PATIENT (Aug. 29).—Dr. Goodwin, veterinary surgeon, is in love with Cissy Morgan. Her father, a rheumatic, objects to the doctor's attentions to his daughter.

Mr. Morgan's horse is taken sick, and Dr. Goodwin prescribes for the much-valued animal. About the same time Mr. Morgan's attendant sends for an M. D. to visit his master, and prescribe for his ailments.

The young veteriuary hands the prescription for the horse to the servant with instructions to take him out in the open air, trot him about briskly, and rub him with Nag's liniment, give him a cold bath with the hose, wrap him with a blanket, and allow him to rest. The servant, supposing that the prescription is for his master, proceeds to put it in operation, with the assistance of two or three able-bodied stablemen.

After this vigorous and strange treatment, Mr. Morgan finds himself so much better that he gives Dr. Goodwin his daughter's hand in marriage.

QUEER FOLKS (Aug. 29).—A romance of the side show, in which the living skeleton falls in love with the fat woman, and the bearded lady falls in love with the skeleton, and the fat woman falls in love with Sampson, the strong man, and he is in love with the bearded lady. The fat lady, notwithstanding the love of the strong man for the bearded lady, is intent upon getting him by fair means or foul. The skeleton has the same contention about the fat woman, and, in order to win her, dresses himself up as a gay Lothario and twangs a banjo outside of her tent, but is obliged to beat a hasty retreat, as his fellow curiosities show their appreciation by throwing missiles in his direction.

He challenges the strong man to fight a duel with him. The bearded lady hurls defiance at the fat lady. The skeleton knocks out Sampson and the bearded lady puts the crimps in the fat woman, who turns the tables on the bearded lady, flattening her out like a pancake, and the skeleton keeps his man down by placing a thousand pound dumbbell on his chest.

The fat lady is so impressed with the skeleton's prowess and manliness she falls into his arms, all his and his alone. The bearded lady lifts the thousand pound dumbbell from the chest of the strong man; he jumps for her, takes her to his arms, whiskers and all.

THREE BROTHERS (Aug. 30).—"Gold in the Klondike" is the bulletin which attracts the attention of three brothers, who decide to go there. They decide to take a chance in striking it rich or failing in the attempt. They hasten home and make known their determination to their old mother and father, who naturally are grieved, but finally convince the old folk that they will be successful in their efforts. The boys bid father and mother farewell.

In the Klondike they strike the Chilcoot pass and are tramping over the trails, leading to the gold fields. They meet with ups and downs of success and failure; they become homesick, and make up their minds to return home. They turn toward the border, and with their dog trains prepare to start homeward. Supplied with what is left of the necessaries of life they struggle through the deep snows and over tundra in the midst of the blinding storms.

Their dogs desert them or perish in the merciless cold and snow, and they are brought to the last extreme. There is but one vestige left of their supplies—a small piece of pork. They are starving to death. Each one insists upon the other taking what remains of their food. They all refuse, each protesting that the other should eat the piece of pork. Soon they are succumbing to that drowsiness and sickness which are the forerunners of freezing to death. The snow soon covers them and they lie unconscious under its little white shroud. A band of prospectors with well laden dog trains happen along their way, and the brothers are placed upon the sleds and brought to a nearby camp, where they are restored to consciousness and sent on their homeward way rejoicing.

The old mother, who has lost her husband and is now all alone, despairing of ever seeing her boys again, is filled with delight at the return of her three stalwart sons to cheer and bless her old age.

THE CALL OF THE WILDERNESS (Aug. 31).—John Stuart, the young Londoner, who received a monthly remittance from the estate of his late uncle, found life rather boresome, now that all his whims were satisfied by the aid of plenty of spending money, and as a last recourse, decided to go to America and buy a mine.

In a lonely spot in Colorado, far from the usual path of any "pale face," sat Starlight, only daughter of White Buffalo, the dead chief, mourning his death. At his resting place she remained until bodily wants overcame her and she sank in a faint. Stuart, the miner, in search of a suitable location, found the girl exhausted and carried her to his cabin.

In a week or so Starlight became better and Stuart thought it time she return to her camp.

Scene from Melies Release "The Call of the Wilderness."

The Indian girl was surprised. Was she not by every Indian right bound to marry Stuart? Could an Indian maiden return to her camp ALONE? With the fervor of her youth, she clasped Stuart about the neck and begged him.

The marriage over, the little cabin soon gave evidence of her housewifely skill. All was happiness and bliss until one day Stuart received word from his London solicitors that, his aunt dead, he was now sole heir to his uncle's estate and to come to London at once. Stuart left Colorado hurriedly and secretly, lacking courage to bid Starlight farewell.

In England a grand reception awaited the heir. Ambitious mothers with marriageable daughters flocked about him galore. They bored him with their attentions. They asked him about his life in America, which suddenly brought back to his mind visions of his little cabin in the woods, and of his little Indian bride. He realized he never should have left her—that she might now be dying, waiting for him.

It was the call of the wilderness.

He returned with all speed to the little Colorado town, hastened to his cabin, but it was empty, and devoid of all evidence of recent habitation. He roamed the woods, calling: "Star-light, Star-light," but there came no answer. Suddenly he thought of the dead chief's grave. He rode like mad to the spot, and there lay Starlight, almost gone. He clasped her to his breast, gave her drink and warmed her hands. Finally she opened her eyes and recognized her husband. With a last feeble effort she once again clasped her arms aronnd his neck and drew his face close to hers for a kiss. And then, with a contented smile, she sank back in his arms. A broken heart had been given eternal rest.

RELIANCE.

A LITTLE CHILD (Aug. 23).—While the nurse is coquetting with her sweetheart, Baby Rosanna wanders off and meets the burglar. She plays with him, ruffles his hair, and gives him her cookies, and it is with genuine regret that he parts from her when the frantic nurse finds her. That night the burglar breaks into Rosanna's home through her bedroom window. She awakens and recognizes him in the moonlight. He quickly gathers together the silverware, when Rosanna runs to him and wants to renew the morning's play. She soon falls asleep in his arms, and the soft little burden awakens in him tender memories of his tiny sister of years past. Gently he carries her to her little bed, softly kisses her, and with tears streaming down his face exits without his plunder.

GRANDFATHER (Aug. 19).—Alice Horton's favored suitor is George Blake. His rival, favored by her father, is Jim Harris. The clash of the men bring forth some interesting situations. Mr. Horton places some money in his desk, and old Grandfather secretes it in the fireplace. As George was the last man in the room he is suspected of the theft, and having ridden away on horseback Alice gallops after him. Indignant, he returns to face his accusers, and is placed under arrest by the sheriff, Jim Harris giving false evidence against him. Grandfather awakes from a doze, and when he learns what the commotion is about remembers his action and gets the money. Mr. Horton is mortified at his unjust accusation of George, and willingly consents to his marriage to Alice.

BISON.

A COWBOY'S LOYALTY (Aug. 22).—Jack and Dolores have a quarrel and he jilts her, transferring his attentions to Inez. Dolores turns to Dick for consolation. At a dance Dolores and Dick are in the wardrobe room when Inez dances past the door and sneers at Dolores. She snatches Dick's gun and fires, and Jack falls, mortally wounded. Dick forces Dolores to escape through the window, and declares he fired the shot. That night he escapes from prison, and, accompanied by Dolores, goes far away, where they marry and live down the past. A woman who was concealed in the wardrobe room tells the sheriff the true state of facts. Years later Inez discovers the couple and notifies the sheriff. When he comes to arrest them and discovers their reformation and happiness and sees their little child he tears the warrant up and leaves them in peace.

PIONEER DAYS (Aug. 25).—John Craig travels West in a prairie schooner, builds a cabin and prepares to till the soil. Indians attack him, kill his wife and leave him for dead on the ground. His little son, Joe, is saved, having gone to the spring for water. The boy thinks both parents dead and runs into the woods. He comes upon a prospector, who adopts him and he grows into a stalwart man. The two discover a mine and post a sign on their claim. John recovers consciousness, but is crazed by the blow and wanders around as a tramp. Years later, during an altercation with another knight of the road, he receives a blow on the head which restores his mind and memory. He makes his way back to the old cabin, and finally comes upon the sign. Investigation discloses that it is really his son, and he is joyfully received.

AMBROSIO.

GULNARA (Aug. 23).—Sathas, a Greek traitor, joins the Turkish army, and abducts Gulnara, the beautiful wife of Zacarias, a Greek warrior. The husband disguises himself as a Dervish and succeeds in securing admission to the palace. He is recognized by Sathas, arrested and thrown in jail. Gulnara slays the Pasha, and takes his ring, which is a badge of authority. The use of the ring permits her to reach her husband's side, and the couple plan to escape by means of a rope. Gulnara descends safely, but as her husband follows Sathas appears at the window and cuts the rope, dashing Zacarias to the rocks.

THANHOUSER.

THE MOTH (Aug. 29).—A young man, "a City Chap," decided to spend his vacation in the country, and made a profound impression upon the villagers, who were honored by having him in their midst. He was so neatly dressed, that the rural swains found themselves cast in the background.

He made a profound impression upon the belle of the village, and even her mother heartily approved of him.

But a moth was the cause of his undoing. Ma found the moth in her home, and her anguish was intensified when she discovered that he had been dining on some of her winter clothes.

At the village drug store she secured some "moth candles," guaranteed to light any moth to an unwept grave. The directions were to light these candles after closing all the windows and doors, and then wait for results.

Ma did as she was told. Having some spare time on her hands, she and her daughter paid a call on a neighbor.

While they were away, the "City Chap" dropped around to pay a call upon the young woman he admired. He saw smoke curling under the door, and realized that the place was on fire. And having his chance to be a hero, he seized it promptly.

The energetic young city chap fairly hummed around, organized a bucket brigade, and under his directions they poured gallons of water on the structure, smashed in the doors, and "saved" the furniture by hurling it out of the windows. But he saved the house, all right, and waited modestly for a few kind words when Ma came home.

In a few well chosen words she told him what she thought of him, and explained that as she loathed moths, they would be far more welcome as guests than he would be.

He never saw the girl again. But he believed that he was unjustly treated, and that some women are extremely unkind.

ROMEO AND JULIET (Sept. 1).—Two rival noble families of Verona who for several generations have been bitter foes, Juliet, the daughter of the Capulets, and Romeo, son of the Montagues, meet and love; before they know that, on account of the family feud, they can never be united in marriage.

Shortly after this, young Romeo is banished from Padua for dueling, and is compelled to bid his young bride farewell. During his absence, Capulet endeavors to force his daughter, Juliet, to marry a nobleman he has chosen for her.

In her distress, Juliet turns to the Friar, who secretly married them. This kindly old man agrees to help the lovers. He gives Juliet a sleeping potion, which, after she has taken it, will make her seem dead. It is his intention to take the supposedly dead Juliet from her tomb, and reunite her to her banished husband.

He sends a message to Romeo, telling him of the plan, but unfortunately news of Juliet's death reached Romeo before the Friar's message. The distracted youth purchases a vial of poison, and taking it with him to the tomb, where he finds the apparently lifeless body of Juliet, he drains the deadly potion. Juliet revives soon after this, and finding on the steps of the tomb the body of her beloved husband, takes her own life. When the Friar arrives upon the scene, intending to free Juliet, and unite the lovers, he finds them already united in death.

LUX.

BILL FOLLOWS THE DOCTOR'S ORDERS (Aug. 25).—Bill consults his medical man, the latter's prescription being "more exercise." Bill purchases a Sandow developer with which to carry out the doctor's commands. He is delighted with the instrument, and hastens to affix it to the wall in his bathroom. But he unfortunately upsets the bath in his efforts, and is forced to retire downstairs, where he tries the door-handle, with no better results, however, as the strain is too great, and he is propelled with much force into the middle of a party of people feasting inside the room. Not seriously damaged, William picks himself up and seeks exercise out of doors. He fixes the elastic developer to the back of a motor, and is enjoying a free and original ride through the town when a policeman intervenes.

WHAT A PENNYWORTH DID (Aug. 25).—Tim is leisurely dragging out a mournful tune from a hurdy-gurdy, placed outside a cabinet maker's shop, with the result that the proprietor finds his workmen three parts asleep. The maids employed in shaking mats are also very sleepily inclined, so much so that the cabinet-maker drags Tim and his instrument of torture off to the nearest cafe. Here Tim is much interested in a machine giving electrical "shocks," and invests in a "pennyworth." The result is startling in the extreme: Tim drags his hurdy-gurdy back to the workshop and plays for all he is worth, the employees setting about their tasks with a rapidity that leaves nothing to be desired. The maids perform wonders with the carpets, market women stop their bargaining and join in a wild jig, while a party of sandwich men perform curious evolutions in the street. Even the table and the chairs outside a cafe are immune from the charm of music and after a curious waltz dash away in all directions. The horses and cabs on a rank also join in, while Tim turns and turns. Finally he is escorted to the police station, where police and commissioners alike join in, Tim taking advantage of their dancing to leave, still holding his beloved hurdy-gurdy.

CHAMPION.

A DAUGHTER OF DIXIE (Aug. 28).—Nell Colling loved Newton Barry, who was a Northern boy. When war broke out Barry bade his sweetheart good-bye and went away to don the Union blue.

Nell's brother fought for the South. The fortunes of war had brought a battle right to the doors of Nell, and two of the participants in that battle were Newton Barry and Tom Collings, the brother. Newton, wounded and separated from his comrades, took refuge in the home of his sweetheart. The Confederates tracked him there, led by Tom.

Nell hid Newton in a secret closet, but was discovered by Tom. Seizing a musket from one of the troops, she held it at her brother's breast and there kept it until Newton was far away on his journey.

When the war ended Tom was first to join in the glad welcome extended to Newton on his return to wed his sister.

HOW TONY BECAME A HERO (Aug. 30).—A band of marauding Indians ransack a ranch, when cowboys suddenly cast upon the scene. Mounted on a jackass, Tony is complacently jogging along, when the Indians fall upon him. He leaps off and climbs a tall tree, while the redskins build a fire below. The smoke compels Tony to descend, and he is dragged to their camp.

The chief's daughter falls in love with Tony. Aided by her, they flee the camp. The pair dash away, Tony clinging to the neck of the horse. They dash into the midst of the cowboys.

The cowboys decide to hold the Indian maiden as a hostage until the Indians return the things they have stolen.

The Indians come to carry out the arrangements, where Tony is guarding the chief's daughter. Tony has gotten hold of some wine, and he sees that it goes around freely, pretending to imbibe himself of the juice which inebriates.

The old chief pleads with Tony to be allowed to see his daughter. Tony grants permission to all the Indians to do likewise. The moment they have all entered where the Indian girl is held the doors are barred hard and fast. That is how Tony became a hero.

YANKEE.

THE POWER OF DEVOTION (Aug. 28).—Jack Mason, the successful Wall Street magnate, becomes insane from overwork, his insanity takes the form of hatred and jealousy toward his loyal wife. He attempts to kill her and is sent to a sanitarium as a dangerous maniac.

Information comes of his escape from the sanitarium, and cannot be found. His wife takes up the search single handed.

Emaciated and ragged she finds him in one of their former trysting places and in attempting to escape from her, he falls down a deep cliff and is found there unconscious. The fall regains his reason. The first face he gazes upon is that of his devoted wife, and her devotion brings him back to health and reason.

A GREAT WRONG RIGHTED (Sept. 1).—After having drank himself into poverty, Zeke Thompson, a young sailor, realizes the error of his ways and turns to seek other means of support for himself and loving wife.

He goes to his father's home and comes just in time to interrupt a burglar at his work. A struggle ensues in which Zeke is felled. When he recovers his mind is a total blank.

His hat is left in the room and is discovered by his father, who suspects him of having robbed him. Wandering along the docks he receives work as a deckhand upon an outgoing steamer.

The burglar, who was also a sailor, seeks the "cup that cheers" and is soon in a semi-conscious state. While in this condition he is shanghaied and placed aboard the same vessel that Zeke has been put on. He comes face to face with Zeke and realizes that his blow has deprived Zeke of memory. Remorse sets in and he tries to recall to Zeke the scene of the conflict. The men become fast friends. A wreck occurs and Zeke saves the life of his companion almost sacrificing his own. A blow on the head during the rescue brings back his memory and he first learns that his sailing companion is the man who had robbed his father.

Zeke becomes ill and his companion nurses him back to health and strength. They are rescued and Zeke forgives his companion.

The sailor confesses to Zeke's father that he was the guilty one and Zeke, vowing never to touch liquor again, is clasped in the arms of his loving wife.

GREAT NORTHERN.

A TRAITOR TO HIS COUNTRY (Aug. 26).—Lieutenant Polvino, a rejected suitor to General Zodanoff's daughter, is in league and conspiracy with the enemies of his country to sell them certain important plans and war documents. To revenge himself for the humiliation of refusal received at the hands of the general's daughter, she causes suspicion for the theft of the plans to fall on his successful rival, Lieutenant Orlof. The general, in due course, discovers, much to his amazement, the loss of the papers, and as prearranged by Dobrinow, suspicion falls upon the innocent Orlof, who, after a brief trial is court-martialed and sentenced to suffer the penalty of death. Friends of Orlof, however, who are confident of his innocence, make every effort to track the real offender, and eventually Lieutenant Dobrinow is suspected. His movements confirm the suspicion. He is followed and arrested in secret conclave with

The messenger arrives in the nick of time, and the innocent officer is released at once, whereupon he is soon at the side of his sweetheart.

SOLAX.

A GAY BACHELOR (Aug. 23).—Mr. James, a gay old bachelor, meets a bewitching and flirtatious widow at the beach and becomes so smitten that he asks permission to call at her city home. He finally proposes marriage and is accepted, when to his horror, he finds that she is the mother of five children. His friend advises him to go to an orphanage, where he succeeds in getting the matron to lend him five children, whom he presents to the widow, representing them to be his own. But to his consternation she accepts them all with open arms, and poor James has to make the best of the bargain.

THE STAMPEDE (Aug. 25).—A troop from a Western post is in pursuit of a band of smugglers. Sergeant Cooper is sent with a message telling them to return to post, but on his way he stops to see his sweetheart, where he is captured by the chief of the band. The chief sends his men back to the post for the purpose of stampeding the horses while he takes after the girl. She escapes and tries to stop the stampede, but is forced to flee before the onrush of the terrified animals. Cooper makes his escape and arrives just in time to rescue his sweetheart and capture the brigand.

ALIAS YELLOWSTONE JOE (Aug. 23).—Joe Murdock, alias Yellowstone Joe, cattle rustler, had been captured, much to the satisfaction of Sheriff Dillon, who, after seeing his prisoner locked in jail, and placed Deputy Wilson on guard, hurries home to tell his daughter of his capture.

He is met by a messenger, who advised him that the gang of which Yellowstone was captain, had already crossed the lines into his country. Mounting his horse, the sheriff, accompanied by his daughter, starts off to organize a posse. In the meanwhile, Yellowstone has stolen away from the jail and secures the deputy's horse and galloped away before his escape was discovered.

Entering the woods, he is soon in again with his friends, and are holding a conversation, when the sheriff's daughter returns on her way home, one of the crew, Long Bill, stops her and insists upon kissing her. The girl, who recognizes Yellowstone, to whom she had given a glass of water as he passed with her father on his way to jail, appealed to him for assistance. Instantly a quarrel arose between the men, which ended in Yellowstone being bound to a tree while his followers placed an ace of spades over his heart and were about to fire, when the sheriff and his men could be seen approaching.

Leaping into their saddles the rustlers dash away, followed by the entire posse. The girl shouts to her father that she would hold Yellowstone a prisoner until they return, but instead she released her protector and gave him a horse and a gun so that he might make good his escape.

MUTT & JEFF AND THE COUNTRY JUDGE (Aug. 26).—Mutt and Jeff are seen wandering down the country road, thinking all sorts of despairing thoughts, and unaware of the friendly greetings, the ready bows and the sweet whispers of trees, grass and zephyrs. On Jeff's face one may see Dante's Inferno, while Mutt's shrinking visage is too eloquent for mere words. Suddenly his optics twinkle and shoot forth a shaft of hope upon the hopeless Jeff.

Mutt has an idea that is sure to work well. If the banking business is bad, why not try automobiling? There are plenty of autos whizzing past the country road; all that Jeff has to do is to "get in touch" with one of the horseless things, and—well, leave it to Mutt to collect damages.

Like all the ideas propounded by Mutt, this one also gains the disapproval of Jeff. He cannot see why he should be the goat and buck a bucking automobile. Mutt's logic, however, finally overmasters the unhappy little fellow and he's ready for the sacrifice.

The plan is finely executed, for Jeff gets fairly well mussed up and Mutt gets ten dollars for—funeral expenses. A series of serious things befall the crafty Mutt, who is finally made to "cough up" that accursed ten spot.

ECLAIR.

A MARRIAGE IN THE STARS (Aug. 28).—Pretty Jeanne Debray is in love with her cousin Raymond; gentle Mrs. Debray favors the attachment, but Mr. Debray, suddenly becoming aware of the truth, drives Raymond from the house. Encouraged by Mrs. Debray, the young man returns to ask for the hand of his love, but the occasion is inopportune, for Mr. Debray is suffering from a violent toothache. The lover departs, heartbroken, and Jeanne gives herself over to despair. Gazing at the laudanum her father is applying to his tooth, she contemplates suicide. The mother anticipates her, and replaces the drug with water. The lovers agree upon a suicide pact—if they cannot be united on earth, they will join each other among the stars. They meet at the last trysting place, and after swallowing the supposed poison, embrace, eagerly awaiting death. There they are discovered by the agitated father and the composed mother, still waiting for death! Papa repents of his cruelty, and the lovers gladly abandon their dreams of the stars!

AN OBLIGING YOUNG MAN (Aug. 28).—Percy, a well-bred, delightful young fellow, feels it incumbent upon himself to render assistance to his fellow-being whenever the opportunity presents itself. In his eagerness not to miss an occasion, Percy often finds himself in some rather "tight" places. We see how he manages to carry an old lady's grip, restore a lost handkerchief, and do numerous other acts of courtesy all at once—and the results! He swings a lady who has a tired husband, helps catch a thief, assists a dentist, all in a jiffy, and the film ends in a most astonishing climax, which proves a new maxim, "Courtesy is its own reward."

REX.

THE COLONEL'S DAUGHTER (Aug. 17).—Lieut. Perry wins the General's daughter, Helen, and Lieut. Thorne, an old enemy and rival, disappointed and defeated, seeks a means of revenge upon the more fortunate suitor. There is to be a military ball at the post that night, and Thorne evolves a shrewd plan of placing Perry in a compromising situation. He goes to an inn of ill repute in the vicinity, and proposes to one of the immoral women, Milly, to attend the ball with him and make a scene involving Perry.

During an interval between dances, Thorne approaches Perry and his sweetheart, and presents his companion to them. Thorne asks Helen for a dance, which is granted, leaving Perry to dance with the hired woman. While they are dancing, Milly feigns faintness, and Perry escorts her to the veranda, where she might get some air. Thorne sees the incident, and grasps the opportunity to tell Helen that he loves her and that Perry is false to her. Helen denounces the slander, and he challenges her to go with him to the veranda and prove his accusation true. She goes. Perry is seen fanning Millie, who seems to have recovered. She asks Perry to sit beside her for a moment. She tells him she loves him, and puts her arms about his neck. Perry, bewildered and astonished, stares at her—but the evil has been done; Helen has seen, and with a breaking heart she re-enters the ballroom with Thorne. A little later, when Perry returns, she spurns him. He tries to explain, but she walks away from him, asking Thorne to see her home.

He who plays with fire will be burned. Millie blackmails Thorne for more money, more and still more. At last he can give her no more, and she threatens to tell Helen all. Thorne, driven to desperation rifles the safe in the commissary. A soldier detects him in the act, and forces him to replace the money. In the meantime, Milly has carried out her threat and told Helen and the General what she has done. Helen seeks out Perry and—well, just what you expect happens.

CASTLES IN THE AIR (Aug. 24).—Bedelia, the maid, is berated by her mistress for tardiness, and, ruminating on her hard lot in life, falls asleep. Then a sweet dreamlet gets on the job and works overtime.

Bedelia becomes mistress of the house, and the real master and mistress become man and maid, who obsequiously obey her orders, and whom she scolds and reprimands with the haughtiness of a duchess. She falls heir to a paltry million, and acquires social ambitions. She puts a personal in the newspapers, stating that she would be pleased to entertain a lord. Of course, the lord calls. Lord, what a dream!

Automobiling, yachting, entertaining, follow in quick and rapturous succession, until—Bedelia opens her eyes with a start. Dreamland has vanished, Paradise is lost, and Bedelia goes back to nature—and the kitchen.

POWERS.

THE WHITE CHIEF (Aug. 29).—Bright Eyes, an Indian Maid, marries a white trapper. He leaves her alone with an infant. Not knowing what to do, she returns to her tribe, leaving her babe on the bank of the river. She is received back in the tribe and when the squaws are sent for water the babe is found. She, keeping the secret, asks to be allowed to raise the babe, which is granted. After twenty years, Stalwart Brave, the papoose, contests for the chieftainship in the lariat duel on horseback. He defeats the champion and becomes the White Chief. He falls in love with the old chief's daughter, but is denied her. The brave he defeated, for revenge on the old chief, lashes him. Panther leaves her in a rage, vowing revenge. Is rescued by the White Chief and wins the girl.

SILVER TAIL AND HIS SQUAW (Sept. 2).—Silver Tail, an Indian brave, and Panther, members of the Seminole tribe, are both in love with Falling Water is sent by the chief of the but much to his surprise, Falling Water spurns him. Panther leaves her in a rage, vowing vengeance. Falling Water is sent by the chief of the tribe to a ranch to exchange skins. Panther, who overhears the chief give her instructions, sees his chance for revenge, and plots with a Mexican to capture her, which they do. They lash her to the back of her horse and send it galloping through the woods. Silver Tail observes the look of satisfaction which overspreads Panther's face, and feeling mischief is on foot, follows them. He arrives on the scene in time to see the squaw's horse dashing madly through the woods, gives chase and captures it in time to save Falling Water from death.

AMERICAN.

AUNTIE AND THE COWBOYS (Aug. 24).—Bud Norris, a young cowboy on Triple Star Ranch, is very fond of fast horses, and finding a horse that pleases his fancy while at the races, he buys the animal and rides it home.

On the way he passes the home of Daisy Miller, his sweetheart, who lives with her aunt in the outskirts of the town. She greets him, and they are admiring the horse together, when Auntie appears and upbraids Bud for his fondness for racing and tells him never to call upon Daisy again.

Auntie wants a horse of her own, a kind, gentle one. While in town she sees a mule hitched to an old buggy with a sign, "For Sale Cheap," attached to the shafts. She soon makes a bargain with the owner.

She passes the general store where Bud, with some companions, are talking. Bud Mounts his racer and starts to pursue Auntie, and overtaking her, he challenges her to a race. Auntie's sporting blood is aroused, and she whips up her mule. The race is on! Auntie stands up in the seat and urges her mule on, Bud racing close behind her. As Bud has intended, Auntie reaches her home neck and neck with his racer. Auntie is highly pleased, and removes her former objection to his calling upon Daisy.

THE BLOTTED BRAND (Aug. 21).—Oliver Thompson and Bessie Hitchcock are lovers and are determined to marry just as soon as Oliver has saved enough money to start a ranch of his own. He acquires a small herd and draws a picture for Bessie of his newly registered brand, consisting of his initials, O. T., and she draws a picture of her father's brand, the Crescent T, to show the similarity of the two brands. They return to the ranch house and inform Mr. Hitchcock of their intentions, but he refuses to give his consent until Oliver's herd is one-third as large as his own. Oliver returns to his own ranch, with his hope of marriage shattered. Bessie is also despondent. She looks at the brands drawn on the side of the building and traces the outline with her finger. A week later some of her father's cowboys discover that the Crescent T brand is being tampered with. They find a fresh brand running from the crescent, forming the O. T. brand of Oliver Thompson. They inform the ranchman, he declares that Thompson is the rustler, as he is the only man who would be benefited by the change made. They go to Thompson's ranch and accuse him of stealing Hitchcock's cattle. Oliver denies it and offers to assist them.

Bessie when left alone at the ranch, starts out to brand cattle, when she hears approaching horsemen. She mounts her horse and gallops away. The cowboys, seeing the rustler mount, start in pursuit. Bessie dismounts and hides behind a pile of rocks. The pursuing cowboys reach the spot, and immediately dismount, determined to take the rustler. Bessie fires her pistol rapidly in the air. The searching party fire in her direction, and she receives a wound. They surround the rocks. They discover a very much frightened girl, crouching low on the ground. Bessie's father, seeing that she is bent on marrying Oliver, gives his consent to their union on the spot.

IMP.

THE TOSS OF A COIN (Aug. 31).—Dan Gardner, a young man, is down and out. Arrested as a tramp, he is thrown into jail and forced to associate with disreputable characters. He is released and with but a single coin in his pocket.

Arriving at a bridge, he gazes into the water and his thoughts turn to suicide. He reaches in his pocket, extracts the coin and flips it up. Heads he dies and tails he lives. Fate is against him and he is about to carry out the decree when his preserver, Farmer Barton, drives on the scene. Mr. Barton is bound for the village to hire a man to assist him in his farm work. Dan is more than anxious to secure employment and accompanies the kind-hearted farmer home. Dan is fitted out with clothing and takes up his quarters in a detached cabin on the farm.

Alice Barton is the rosy cheeked daughter of the farmer, and has attracted the attention of Ed. White, the sheriff, who released Dan from jail.

Dan and the girl are thrown much into each other's society and the new farm-hand loves her. Assisting her one day in the field where she has sprained her ankle, the truth is forced home to him. He realizes the difference in their stations and resolves to leave the farm and go out into the world again. He flips the coin and once more fate decrees that he should do that which is not satisfactory to him.

The two thieves who were released from prison with him, come to steal the money of the farmer, and while Dan is temporarily absent from his cabin, Alice comes to bring him some socks she has darned. Ed White, the jealous sheriff, notices the action and mistrusts the girl of being unduly intimate with Dan and informs her parents. Dan arrests the scoundrels, holding them up at the point of a gun, and they are turned over to the sheriff, but he is indignant at the accusation of White and is about to leave the farm, when his deed of heroism is made clear to the farmer, who has implicit faith in his daughter.

Dan and Alice have a pretty little love scene and Dan is welcomed by the honest old farmer as his prospective son-in-law, to the discomfiture of the sheriff, who sought to prejudice the old man against him. All ends happily for Dan and he has at last found a home among kind and loving friends.

HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS (Aug. 28).—Margaret and Louise are sisters, the former being the older and no longer young. She reads a notice in a newspaper that Prince Albert is due to arrive in the village to spend a few days, and bidding Louise stay at home and attend to the work in the kitchen, she goes foraging for the prince.

She meets an escaped lunatic, whose form of lunacy is peculiar, in that he imagines himself a prince. He goes to a costumer's and hires a crown, cloak and sword, and sallies forth. He is met by Margaret, who is delighted. She has beaten all the other women in the village in making the acquaintance of the prince.

In the meantime, the real prince arrives and is strolling about the village unnoticed, he happens upon Louise at the well, drawing a bucket of water. He gallantly assists her and is having the lark of his life in helping her about the kitchen, being impressed by her charms. He goes after leaving his card, which proves him the prince.

Margaret is led by the bogus prince to the insane asylum, where he is taken into custody and his identity revealed. She returns home and is chagrinned to learn that the younger sister has been entertaining the prince, but finally congratulates the happy girl.

TOTALLY DESTROYED AND WIPED OUT FOREVER

Disgusting sensationalism of the greatest sensational film ever produced, obliterated and replaced with a clean, interesting and thrilling portrayal of the real life of that famous Missouri outlaw,

JESSE JAMES

A new and modern production taken from authorized biography and one of reliable historical merit.

The most graphic and stirring motion picture of real western drama ever produced, it overflows with spectacular and startling action of continual interest for every moment. Scenes the most thrilling and exciting and climaxes intensely dramatic. It is a picture containing the actual episodes in the life of this historical bandit, bristling with excitement, spiced with good comedy and toned with pathetic incidents of real human interest.

The Edison Projecting Kinetoscope

IT is significant that almost invariably when an exhibitor discontinues one machine and purchases another, his last choice is the Edison. Does this not prove that although his judgment may have been faulty originally, he has seen the error of his ways and is convinced that the only safe, economical and satisfactory way to operate a motion picture theatre is to choose a machine that has been considered standard the world over ever since its introduction fifteen or more years ago.

TRADE MARK

THE Edison Underwriters' Type "B" Model Kinetoscope with outside revolving shutter, today stands absolutely without a near competitor, as the machine that projects the rock-steady, flickerless, sharp pictures photoplay audiences admire—the machine which never fails at the most inopportune moment.

CORRESPONDENCE solicited with those who want the best, and who haven't the time or inclination to "shop around" in an effort to locate it.

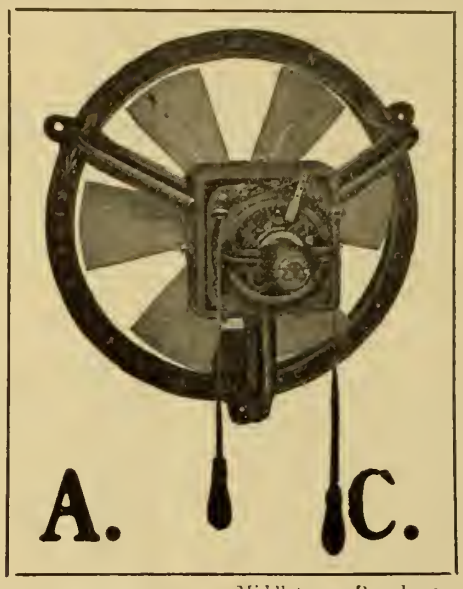
"Best Ventilated Theater in Middletown."

That's what Mr. Condran can now truthfully advertise for the "Majestic" of Middletown, Pa., because he's using a

Kimble A. C. Reversible Fan



Middletown, Pa., June 9, 1911.

Kimble Electric Co., Chicago.

Gentlemen:—I purchased one of your 24 in. Reversible Motor Fans through the Middletown Borough. It has proved very satisfactory and I would highly recommend it for ventilating purposes.

Yours truly,

E. H. CONDRAN,
Mgr. The Majestic Theatre, Lessee & Manager, The Auditorium.

Kimble A. C. Variable Speed Reversible Fans

Move more air per k.w. of current metered than any other fan manufactured.

They reverse instantly, by the pull of a chain, being used at will for intake or exhaust.

Think What That Means to You—Variable Speed

They can be run fast or slow to suit conditions, and cutting the speed in two (between performances or on cool days) cuts the current cost in two.

Speed also, is regulated by the pull of a chain, and the motor can be instantly reversed from full speed intake to full speed exhaust, or the reverse.

MOST FOR THE MONEY

In other words, it does things that no other motor-driven fan can do—things that count for increased efficiency or lowered operating cost.

SIZES AND PRICES

60 cycles, 110 or 220 volts, alternating current.

Diameter.	H.P.	Revolutions Per Minute.	Cubic Feet Air Per Minute.	Weight Crated.	Price F. O. B. Chicago.

MOTORS FOR MOVING PICTURE MACHINES

Our special ⅛ H.P., M. P. Machine Motor does better, evener, more realistic work than can possibly be done by hand—and it leaves the operator's hands free.

One lever controls speed at will from 300 to 3,000 R. P. M.

Its variable speed feature will enable you to do "stunts" that will puzzle the craft and delight the audience.

Read, Mr. Exhibitor, this ANNOUNCEMENT No. 2

THE idea has been suggested that we should give a full statement of the type of productions which characterize our PROGRAMME. We ourselves have wanted to do that very thing, but when it came down to the actual work of handling such a statement so as to pass it on to the public for consideration, we found that a pen description failed to do justice and in any event is after all but a mere statement which puts us right up to the issue and decides our course to let our pictures speak for themselves. The pictures are convincing everyone who has seen them, and we are satisfied to await the verdict of facts the pictures themselves in actual release.

MUTT and JEFF and the COUNTRY JUDGE

RELEASED SATURDAY, AUGUST 26th, 1911

C. D. Struble

Sec'y-Treas. of the United Motion Picture Company, Oklahoma City, Okla., says:—

"MUTT and JEFF are the real, old-time coin getters. Never in the history of Moving Pictures has any film created the sensation, or proven so immensely popular as MUTT and JEFF. They have simply turned Moving Picturedom upside down. We are now buying two prints of every MUTT and JEFF picture, and being flooded with orders; we shall soon need a third in order to take care of the business. If three won't do, we shall buy more. The success of these Nestor Comics is phenomenal."

The Manager of one of the largest exchanges in the country, possessing keen business sense, writes as follows:—

"MUTT and JEFF are certainly leading us a dog's life. I believe if I had a thousand copies of MUTT and JEFF I could keep them all busy."

I. Eckstein

Owner of the Orpheum Theatre, 352 Broad St., Newark, N. J., informs us that,

"The MUTT and JEFF pictures are, I think, the best comedies ever turned out. Whenever I show MUTT and JEFF I have to turn away hundreds of people."

THE DIVING GIRL

DRAMATIC

With her Uncle she visits the seashore and goes bathing with a party of her brother's friends. Uncle also takes a dip and is annoyed at the perilous performance of the girl. He orders her from the water and locks her in her room, but brother releases her. He finally concludes that home is the best place for her, for there she will run no chance of drowning.

Approximate length 502 feet.

$500 REWARD

A burglar enters the home of a wealthy man and steals a valuable necklace. A reward of $500 is offered for the thief's apprehension. A couple of rube detectives start out to find the robber and only succeeded in taking into custody the victim of the robbery and the real detective who is in the case. An ordinary copper gets the thief and wins the reward. Approximate length 496 feet.

RELEASED AUGUST 24th, 1911

THE ROSE OF KENTUCKY

A Romance of the Fields of Tobacco

The little girl, having lost her mother by death, would have been a homeless orphan had not the generous natured planter adopted her. He sends her to school, and as he watches her progress he also realizes a growing interest in her that digs deep into his heart. Feeling that he is too old to be her husband, he encourages her interest in his partner, who is a younger man. But she, in spite of the planter's efforts at concealing his love, appreciates the fact that he is making a sacrifice for her welfare, as he sees it. However, she herself loves her benefactor, and is given an opportunity to reject the younger man, as he shows the yellow streak when the night riders attack the planter's tobacco barns.

Approximate length 997 feet.

A WILD CAT PROPOSITION IS ON THE CHASE AGAIN

LISTEN not to alluring propositions of floating stock on a proposed market, advertisements of a complete program, etc., never heard of before, as insecure as a marsh meadow. A wrong step and you are swamped.

We have devoted years, employed many brains and spent big money to make the Independent market what it is today. We have fought your way through all legal controversies and launched you safely on solid ground where we stand today as strong as the Rock of Gibraltar. We always have held and always shall hold our business on the merit of our goods.

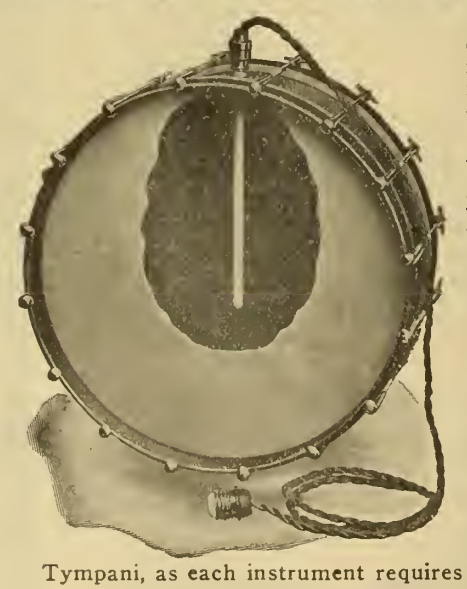
KEEP YOUR DRUM HEADS DRY



The very nature of drum heads causes them to absorb moisture readily, and when the heads become damp it is an absolute certainty that your drum will lose its brilliancy.

Our latest invention, the Electric Drum Heater, entirely overcomes this difficulty, for by its use you can keep your drum brilliant and snappy regardless of the weather.

This device can be attached to any drum and the connecting plug will fit any ordinary 110-volt incandescent lamp socket. It gives no light; never burns out; may be turned on and off at will, or if desired, entirely removed in a few seconds time. Entire outfit, including the Heater proper, two connecting plugs, and six feet of cord, weighs eight ounces—the Heater but two. It is practically indestructible and can easily be carried in your drum case.

Be sure and say whether you wish it for Snare Drum, Bass Drum, or Tympani, as each instrument requires a different strength.

Try one—your money back if you are not entirely satisfied

Are You Going To Be First, or Last?

Since placing our system for displaying programmes before the exhibitors of motion pictures, we have been more than surprised the way orders have been coming in from live exhibitors all over the country asking that we furnish them with our system at once, as they desire to be the first to put on this high class advertising in their locality.

THERE-IS-A-REASON

for this, as a good live wire knows that by introducing a class of advertising of so high a character that he is bound to get the business away from his competitor who is still plodding along in the same old fashioned way of using unsightly posters and smearing the front of his theatre all over with paste.

The fellow who takes time for doing things, is a lazy cousin to the fellow who does time for taking things to put in those

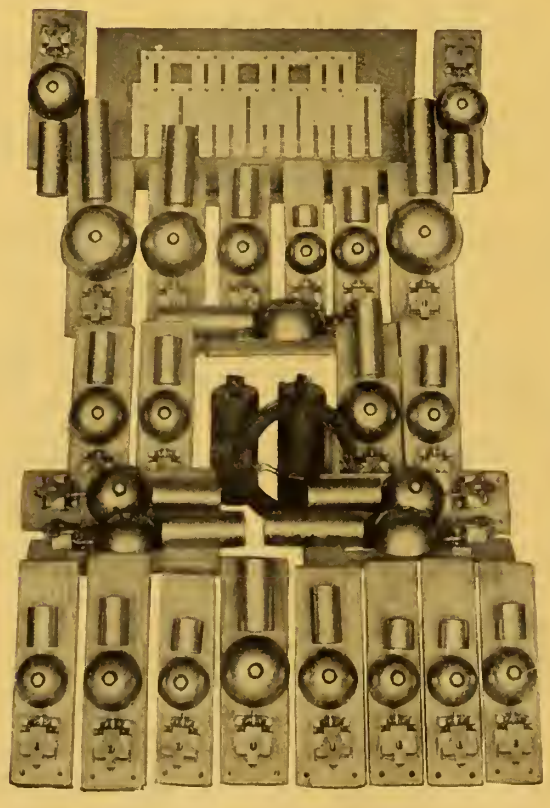
DEAGAN BELLS

They are a real attraction and will increase your patronage at once.



Complete set ready to ship.

See here what one exhibitor says:

The Electric Saucer Bells arrived all O.K. on Friday and we had them installed in our Theatre and started them on Sunday following, and it is our pleasure to inform you that they have given the utmost satisfaction. Our audience was wild with enthusiasm. The installing of the bells increased our patronage at once. They are classy and add quality to any theatre.

JACOBI & FLETCHER,
IDLE HOUR THEATRE,
SHEBOYGAN, WIS.

Deagan's Musical Electrical Bells are made of finest bell metal, as per our own formula, and are fitted with our Patent resonaters which add fully 100% to the tone of the Bells as well as making the sound sweet, clear and silvery.

The Bells are played from a key board, same as a piano, and any one can play them with a few minutes' practise. They are correctly tuned to your piano, and can be played as a solo instrument, with or without piano accompaniment, as an accompaniment to songs, during intermission, etc.

The key board can be placed in any desired location and the bells be mounted in any part of the house, on the ceiling, side walls, under seats, corners, odd places, etc., producing the most startling effects to endless surprise and delight of the audience.

Any person can install a set of these Bells in a few hours; no experience is necessary, as complete instructions are included with each set.

We can supply you a complete outfit of these marvellous Bells for $40.00 and up.

Don't miss this opportunity. Write to day for terms and catalogues.

Proving That Kindness Pays

Count Ivan and the Waitress

An old musician, discharged from a theatre orchestra by a brutal leader whose enmity he had incurred, enters a cheap restaurant, eats, and pays for his food. But the payment is in "bad" money, which an unscrupulous pawnbroker passed on him. Result: Restaurant man calls a policeman. But a pretty little waitress changed the black complexion of things a bit; and then a stray newspaper item throws full light into the darkness. And in the light the waitress-with-a-heart shone resplendent, thanks to the musician who remembered.

Vault Scene from "Romeo and Juliet"

Released Friday, Sept. 8

PART TWO

Romeo and Juliet

By William Shakespeare

Each part is so constructed that it tells a complete story on its own account. Giving a half-hour's show as the two parts do when used together, they will enable exhibitors to give a "Romeo and Juliet Night" that affords all manners of opportunity for feature advertising. Many managers will use them as they appear, for the first showing, and book them together for the return date. As the depiction of "the greatest love story of all," and a classic of the highest type, the subject is one that you can make your theater remembered by.

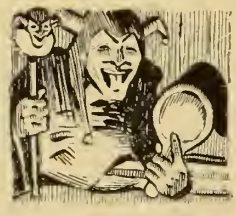
"The General's Daughter"

Monday, August 28

The General, in his country's service in the Soudan, is captured in a terrible battle with the "Mad Mahdi." In defense of his daughter he fights the howling Dervishes and rabid fanatics until they are rescued by the Highlanders, who put them to rout.



"THE WRONG PATIENT"
"QUEER FOLKS"

Tuesday, August 29

These are both on the same reel and in the same class of irresistible provokers of broad smiles and contagious laughs.

"THE THREE BROTHERS" Wednesday, August 30

In search of gold, they brave the hardships of Alaska, come near perishing in the cold and snows, return home to cheer their old mother's declining years. It is filled with a motive that holds us in a thrill of interest.

"THE THUMB PRINT" Friday, September 1

An impressive Drama, strong in plot, absorbingly grasping throughout. In the court scene, where the thumb-mark expert proves a woman innocent, it reaches a climax of breathless excitement.

"THE PRINCE AND THE PUMPS" Saturday, September 2

A modern "Prince Charming" steals a girl's slipper and wins her hand through her foot. See how he does it in this refined comedy.

And this season they will not only get more, but we are equipped to outdo the best efforts of former years. Watch the audience when the "Lubin" is "on."

¶ Releases will be a high class drama, a genuine Western, a snappy comedy and a "split."

LUBIN FILMS

Released Thursday, August 31st Length about 1000 feet

The ROMANCE of POND COVE

One of the best love stories of the year. Arthur Moore loses his fortune and with it Ethel, the girl he loves. He goes away to forget, to work. In later years he returns, a prosperous engineer, and wins the hand of Flo, Ethel's little sister, who had been his staunchest friend in the time of trouble. The acting is perfect.

Scene from "THE ROMANCE OF POND COVE"

Scene From "THE EASTERNER'S SACRIFICE"

Released Saturday, September 2nd Length about 1000 feet

The EASTERNER'S SACRIFICE

About a girl's love for a wayward brother and a man's devotion to a loyal, noble-hearted woman. A love tale of absorbing interest.

Released Monday, September 4th Length about 1000 feet

A GAY TIME IN WASHINGTON

Mrs. Clayton is delighted. Her George is to dine with President Taft. George goes off in high glee, and he and his Pal proceed to do Washington as it should be done. But Taft isn't in Washington and Mrs. C. finds it out—"duped!" Oh! George, wait 'til you get home. It's rich.

Released Wednesday, September 6th Split Reel

A Question of Modesty

Mrs. Earl is perfectly willing that the family doctor should "dope" her up to his heart's content. But when it comes to setting a nether limb —"No-no, modesty forbids." And thus the charming Doctor Jane Joyce gets in the good graces of her future mother-in-law. It's excruciatingly funny. Length about 600 feet.

"PARDON ME"

About a polite old gentleman who gets himself into all kinds of scrapes through his clumsiness. But he is a perfect gentleman, and after each offense "begs pardon" most effusively. Finally he gets mixed up with a policeman who refuses to pardon him, and so we find him behind bars crying out "pardon me." It's a side-splitter. Length about 400 feet.

Woman's Eternal Vanity

Woman—collectively—is good, sweet, tender, true—and vain! Women have often transgressed to obtain the things they craved. They have sinned for men's admiration and man's love; they have erred to obtain the means of winning men's worship and other women's envy.

"The Torn Scarf"

Released Thursday, August 31st

is a picture of woman's vanity, the weakness which permitted her to indulge it, and the evil it led to. Facts and Comments

A SPECTACLE, full of significance to every friend of the moving picture, was being enacted recently in a great American city. On a sultry summer's night, with much of the semi-tropical stifling moisture making breathing to a Northern man a pain rather than a pleasure, a great crowd of intelligent, well-dressed men and women was steadily pouring into a theater, eager to pay fifty cents a seat for witnessing moving pictures. To the proverbial "old, experienced showman," who has learned the alphabet of his profession early and has never learned anything after that, the thing was altogether incomprehensible. It was absolutely against all the rules of his strategy and though he had to admit that the attraction working such a miracle was a "winner," he did it most grudgingly. It is an odd characteristic of the hidebound and conceited, that they would sooner lose according to their own rules and ideas, than win by accepting new ones, for which, owing to large masses of solid ivory, they have no room.

Now, then, what was the attraction, causing men and women to forget the heat and making them eager to pay out money? We have said the attraction consisted of moving pictures. What manner of moving pictures were those that so coolly defied the ancient and hoary traditions? They could not be cowboy stories or the usual weak sentimental concoction or comedy, that seems recently to gain a new hold on the ordinary moving picture theater. No hordes of unwashed yelling boys, no trace of staring idlers or loafers were in sight. There was no unusual display of electric signs, no brass band nor yet any lurid posters. The mystery is growing deeper.

Seriously speaking, there is no mystery about it at all. The American public, balked of its desire for a better and more ambitious moving picture by either the ignorance or lack of enterprise of domestic manufacturers, realizing that somehow a good, fine feature film is within their reach, hastens eagerly to look at it and cares nothing whatever about heat or price. All week the crowds continued and on Tuesday morning the house was sold for Saturday's matinee. The press sets up a shout of extraordinary praise, the clergy begins to see the moving picture in a new light, only the "old, experienced showman" sticks to his creed, that the public in this country are composed in greatest part of imbeciles and illiterates. He cannot be swerved from the old dogma, that the people want to be humbugged and will not pay for anything but the cheapest.

Now what was the picture? It was an old classic, that had lain on the shelves of libraries for seven centuries, quite as accessible to the American as to the European manufacturer. With what scorn would the average American maker have greeted the suggestion of filming Dante's Inferno. Ninety per cent. (liberal estimate) would not have known what "Dante" was or what "Inferno" meant. If it had been explained to them (assuming such a possibility for the sake of argument), they would have dismissed the subject with disdain and not without anger at being interrupted in the production of the "latest and most colossal American film success, 'Red Eagle's War Dance or The Midnight Murder at Rattlesnake Gulch.'"

When the product of an Italian film maker, almost unknown in this country, is needed to get the public into the big theaters at liberal prices, it is very sure that the men, now controlling the business have no just conception of what the public really wants. In the craven fear of going above the heads of the public they have fallen beneath the notice of the intelligent and refined public.

It is passing strange, that the money part of it did not strike them before. The only way to get any sign of healthy cerebration out of them is by talking money. Even this has failed. There are none so blind as those who do not wish to see. Having most arbitrarily fixed a low standard of the intelligence of the American public, largely guided therein by the state of their own intelligence, they refuse to change and in all probability will go on making "the greatest, finest and most beautiful pictures in the world," while foreign film makers with artistic skill and not wholly without an artistic conscience will make more films of a fine and desired character and get the money. As interpreters of public sentiment the majority of domestic manufacturers rank with the official weather prophets in point of sense and accuracy.

When some of the old makers with an increased output deliberately slight the matter of quality, what can be expected of newcomers in the field? It has been said on unquestioned authority, that one of the Independent companies offered a director the staggering amount of thirty-five dollars a week for producing one "comedy" (God save the mark), a week. Even if we did not have the extrinsic evidence in the words of the director himself, the "comedies," thus perpetrated, would furnish plenty of intrinsic evidence.

If this lack of enterprise is to continue, joined to activities which are even worse than the lack of enterprise, the moving picture will have somewhat of a fall in the near future. The picture, however, cannot be killed, not even in the house of its supposed friends. The public has grown too fond of it and is today well aware that a good picture is possible. They will simply wait for the better picture and that it is bound to come, there can be no manner of doubt. A widespread and insistent public demand will not remain unanswered very long. There is today no field, where capital judiciously invested with a due and sensible regard to public needs and demands will bring greater and quicker returns than the field of moving pictures. As to the exhibitors and producers, whom the progress of the day has left so far behind, it is consoling to know, that the night schools will soon open and that no willing man is ever too old to learn.

THE justice in the Special Sessions who recently insisted that the law against bringing minors under sixteen years of age into moving picture houses be strictly enforced has, wittingly or unwittingly, done a good thing for the industry at large. Aside from the fact that every law on the statute book should be consistently observed by every good citizen, there is a special reason why exhibitors should be the first to insist upon a strict and literal enforcement of the law. Children, especially girls, are at all times entitled to the special protection of the law, and sad experience has shown that there are specimens of the human kind sufficiently depraved to lure young girls whom they may find in theatres or moving picture houses into paths of evil.

It is also well to consider that crowds of noisy, unwashed boys are a nuisance to every manager and drive away quiet, respectable people who would otherwise become patrons. Especially in the big city the boy is too often a malicious mischief-maker, and much minor damage has been committed by him around and in moving picture theatres. His conduct in the theatre, too, is very often a source of annoyance to both public and manager. The still all too prevalent belief that the moving picture is chiefly for the benefit of the small boy cannot be corrected too soon. There may be here and there an exhibitor who caters to this element and a producer who depends for his bandit and "Western" stories on the approval of the mentally undeveloped, and whatever can be done to discourage them ought to be done speedily and thoroughly. If a rigorous enforcement of the law will help it along, such enforcement will have the emphatic endorsement of the best elements in the industry.

It is difficult to believe that the restrictions would really harm a boy or girl in search of innocent amusement or perhaps in quest of knowledge and mental improvement. There are few men or women patronizing moving picture houses who would be unwilling to act as a temporary escort or guardian to a boy or girl anxious to go into a moving picture theatre. Some neighbor or friend, known in the vicinity where the child lives can always be found to take boy or girl to the entertainment, a fact which is within the personal knowledge of the writer. Of course, such a law could be made an engine of oppression by the police or by the officers of some "Society for Minding Other People's Business," but there has been no complaint heard on that score, and we do not believe there is any just ground for such a complaint at this time, as the police seem quite sensible and liberal in the matter of the enforcement of the law, and only take action in very flagrant cases.

"And No Man Putteth New Wine Into Old Bottles."

By W. Stephen Bush.

THE moving picture is distinctly and emphatically a modern creation. As a form of amusement it has confronted the legitimate stage for something like a decade; never as a theory, but always as a condition. To the elements that, at the birth of the picture, controlled the world of amusements, it was just about as welcome as the railway to the stage-coach driver of old. Very few took it seriously; many laughed at it as an amusing toy and fad; many more denounced it, but none suspected, that a new power had come into the world of amusements which, in the very first strides of its career, would jump into the front rank of all forms of entertainment.

The men who had, for many years of their lives, managed and directed the amusements of the public, wished, and in most cases, no doubt, sincerely believed, that the moving picture like other "crazes" would have its day and then pass away, leaving no more trace than the foam of a wave that rises and falls. In the very nature of things none of the best of these men connected themselves with the moving picture and its future. They had their own legitimate enterprises, their money was invested in them and it was within the limits of these enterprises that they could use their abilities and experience to best advantage. They were either too old or too conservative to entrust their capital and such investment as was represented by their labor to an innovation which they regarded with disfavor and of whose future they were doubtful. The picture then seemed a proper field for exploitation by the lower elements in the show business, and thus dime museums gave up their managers and the directors of minor theatrical enterprises, the men that follow in the wake of circuses and many other similar elements and classes, found a new occupation. Numerous others were attracted from the ranks of small tradesmen, who had saved a little money and who saw in the new invention a good chance for investment, with "no experience necessary."

As the years went by these inferior elements found themselves no longer in sole possession of the field, for it gradually began to dawn on all the elements in the show business, from the best and highest down, that the moving picture was much more than a fad and that its possibilities were really unlimited. Men, who had, in their treatment of the moving picture, been either indifferent or contemptuous, experienced a change of heart. They became anxious to learn something about this new, promising and disturbing factor in the realm of amusements. As the picture began to win new fields, threatening the very existence of theaters devoted to cheap entertainments and making inroads upon all others, a new class of men came into the business. At heart they were not always in sympathy with the moving picture. Exhibiting the latter was entirely new and strange to them. In one respect they were in a worse state than the ignorant and inexperienced, from which the ranks of exhibitors in the early stages of the industry had been so largely recruited. The latter knew nothing and therefore had to unlearn nothing. The showman, previously engaged in some other theatrical or semi-theatrical enterprise had to unlearn much and for inability to unlearn could often never begin to learn.

He attempted to put new wine into old bottles, an attempt, which, long before the scriptural recording thereof, had always been a flat failure.

A curious feature of this phase of moving picture development is found to this day in the theatrical journals. At first utterly ignoring the moving picture, they later began an attempt to treat it as a subordinate "department" in their columns. In its clipped and orphaned state the picture looks lost in these departments and bears most eloquent witness to the fact, that the putting of new wine into old bottles is a task beyond even the skill and adroitness of professional journalism.

With all the progress, that has been made, the exhibiting part of the industry is still to some extent, chaotic and to an even greater extent purely empiric or experimental. The exhibitor has had no school other than that of practical experience. He has had no manual founded on the experience of generations. Very slowly a new and much higher type of exhibitor is coming forward. The necessity of special aptitude, of certain educational requirements, of a high grade of intelligence is being more generally recognized. As success will more and more gravitate toward this new type it will develop, for it is indeed capable of high development. The new type will be wholly free from the superstitions of the circus and the medicine show and from the narrow limits and conventions of the so-called legitimate stage. This new type will understand and work with the modern spirit of progress in all matters tending to the betterment and enlightenment of mankind. They will be the new vessels into which the new wine is to be poured.

It must always be remembered, that one of the features which distinguishes the moving picture from all other forms of entertainments and which will always characterize it, is its educational value. I do not, of course, use the word "educational" in its narrowest sense. I do not mean, that it is to teach reading, writing and arithmetic. Nor do I mean by educational films only those that teach geography or history or science. I want to make it clear that every film has some educational value, just as every play on the stage has an educational value. As the theater can show but few plays compared to the moving picture house and can show those plays to but a limited number of people, compared to the power of the moving picture, the prominence of the educational feature in the films is obvious.

Moreover the picture can show more and has infinitely greater freedom of movement, both of which factors again make for increased educational values. The picture introduces into the program of amusement and entertainment an element of information and instruction, eagerly welcomed by the public of today, especially in this country, where the desire for knowledge is keener and more widespread than anywhere else in the world.

Thus it will be seen, that the moving picture will carve out its own great destiny without aid from men, who are used to manage and direct older forms of amusement. Its flight can neither be understood nor directed by them.

Historical Pictures

THERE have lately come many historical pictures into the market. The tendency to make historical pictures is one to be greatly encouraged and the following remarks are offered in a spirit of helpfulness and with no view to depreciate the efforts heretofore put forth by various film makers.

Right here it ought to be stated, that the historical picture has within the last years shown some improvement. The first historical pictures we had the dubious fortune of seeing were "Washington at Valley Forge" and "The Battle of Monmouth." From a critical point of view they were both burlesque, pure and simple. As they were made more than four or five years ago and have long since sunk into utter oblivion, it would be ungracious and perhaps unsanitary to exhume them now. They are only mentioned as standards of comparison.

Compared to them such pictures as the recent Edison historic releases are much to be commended. They are, however, by no means perfect, and historic pictures of all others must approach perfection as closely as possible. If they do not fill this requirement they had better not be made at all.

Careful study of history from original sources and not from the versions of historians is absolutely necessary. The whole merit and value of a historical picture must consist in its accuracy. This accuracy must not be confined to the matter of costumes and scenery alone, important as these two details undoubtedly are. Great pains must be taken to conform to the facts, as far as manners and actions are concerned.

Let us, just for an example, take the very interesting events that took place at the outbreak of the Revolution, in the debatable regions between Canada and the revolting colonies. Perhaps the most interesting of the events, which eventually made the upper Hudson Valley American territory, was, barring Saratoga, the battle of Oriskany. It would be easy of production in moving pictures, because no large bodies of men were engaged in it on either side and all the fighting was typical of border warfare.

Now in reproducing such a picture it would be essential to follow most minutely the exact movements of the contending forces and to give a very accurate representation of the hero of the battle, sturdy old General Herkimer. Graphically as well as accurately reproduced, such a picture would have an inestimable educational value. With such a picture as a theme to speak on, the whole meaning of the struggle in the North, its difficulties, its final results and consequences could be made clear to a class in a high school in almost half an hour.

It is not sufficient to choose a historical title and then let the imagination or the needs of the studio and the director determine to do the rest.

Will Specials Lead to Runs

By Epes Winthrop Sargent.

WILL the new special lead to longer runs in the regular photoplay houses? It seems more than probable that they will, for all that is needed to bring about this result is the education of the public and some of the exhibitors to an appreciation of the fact that a photoplay is not like a daily newspaper, to be seen at the moment of issue and then discarded in favor of a later edition.

The intelligent exhibitor already realizes the value of the run, but he is powerless to combat public opinion single handed, and there has been no real combination of exhibitors in any well-defined territory. The theatrical managers combine to effect certain changes, to oppose the demands of the musical union, to adjust traffic matters, hold the billposters in check as far as possible and bring about similar improvements in their business; but the photoplay managers are not all showmen, and the man who is simply "running" instead of managing a house, thinks that any overture made him is a treacherous attempt to undermine his business. The new exhibitor's association for which The Moving Picture World has made so long and determined a campaign, cannot but bring about an improvement in this connection, but at present any suggestion that looks toward a change of bill twice a week is regarded with disfavor by one or more men who take advantage of the sentiment of the others to change daily and use a couple of first runs. The public follows the first run and the daily change, and the consequence is that those cooler heads who believe in doing things sanely and conservatively, are compelled to get in line or lose their patronage.

The answer that each house must change daily to appeal to the daily patronage is all very well as far as it goes. The trouble is that it does not go far enough.

Suppose that in a town of 10,000 there are three houses, each with a capacity of 300, each doing an average business and each appealing to perhaps 200 regulars, giving a matinee and two night shows. Each show pulls perhaps sixty persons who would not come daily were it not for the daily change. In a ten cent house this means $20 a day that would be lost if the pictures were not changed. This is a consideration where the receipts are perhaps not more than $80 or $100 on the day, but one point has been overlooked.

There are two other houses, each with its proportion of daily change patrons. These have not been taken into consideration. They want to see pictures every day. If the Gem gives them new pictures only on Monday and Thursday they will see the pictures at the Savoy on Tuesdays and Fridays and at the Bijou on Wednesdays and Saturdays. Meantime the Savoy patrons are visiting the Gem and the Bijou and the Bijou "fans" turn to the Gem and Savoy. Each house gets all the regulars twice each week. Better still, each house has gained this great advantage that a notable program or some notable film can be made to draw additional business on the second and third days from persons who are not regular picture patrons, but who are induced to attend through the recommendation of those who have seen the program the first day. It is all very well to argue that the picture that made a hit last night can be brought back four weeks from now, but "It's there today and tomorrow" is a better busines getter than "I guess they'll have it back sometime. If they do, be sure to see it."

Time is given to advertise the product, newspaper comment is made possible and the most valuable advertising that is given on the street, in shops and factories, in the home and elsewhere is definitely gained for the successful product.

Special releases remaining a week or more in one place will contribute largely to the suppression of the daily change belief on the part of the patrons. Exhibitors will perceive the value of the idea and the result will be better and more profitable business, less expense and greater opportunity. It may be necessary to change the system of release, but any change that will work for the sale of a greater number of fewer subjects will be beneficial to the manufacturer as well as to the exhibitor. If a manufacturer can make a greater profit from two reels a week than he now realizes from four, he can put more time and money into those two reels and raise the standard of his product without depleting his bank account.

It would seem that the trend is toward better houses which will give room for the three to five reel subjects while the smaller theatres will use the thousand foot subjects and make their appeal as at present.

The photoplay business is still in its swaddling clothes despite the gloomy predictions of the few that the business is retrogressing. Cradled in the nickelodeon, creched in the ten cent house, threatened with the infantile ills of nasty vaudeville, reform attacks and poor literary quality, the photoplay will grow to adolescense and adult stature despite its vicissitudes and the men who encourage the growth, who assist in the operations for the removal of the vaudeville excrescences, who administer the tonic of good plays, the corrective of favorable newspaper comment and the laxative that will purge the business of the hangers-on whose attempts to chain the pictures to the dance halls and holes in the wall, will profit by their care when full growth is attained.

One of the most valuable remedies for the sick photoplay business is the doing away of the suggestion of impermanence and the establishment of the idea of permanency.

The theatrical manager seems to nurse along a "run" because the "run," of itself, will build business, but too few photoplay exhibitors know of the run. It is something well worth observation and the special subject is valuable in permitting this observation.

Short Talks to the Moving Picture League

I.—THE MERITS AND CHARACTER OF THE SHOW.

THE opening of the fall season will test the loyalty of exhibitors to the moving picture. During the hot summer months picture programs have enabled many to keep houses open which otherwise would have been closed. Numerous theatres which hitherto were wedded to cheap vaudeville, and showed to a losing business, have proved that moving pictures can turn a certain loss into handsome profits.

Will the managers who are inclined to combine cheap vaudeville with moving pictures return to their old policy this fall? And will those managers who depended on cheap vaudeville, and were forced to seek financial relief in exclusive picture programs, renew their allegiance to cheap vaudeville? These are questions that will be answered shortly, and the answers will be carefully scrutinized by THE WORLD.

It is difficult to estimate the injury wrought the moving picture by the nickel admission price. The exhibitor knows well that he is giving picture programs that are worth ten cents and more, for five cents. He is also impressed that he cannot afford to increase the price of admission, unless his competitors do likewise. But he determines to increase the price to ten cents, whether his competitors do so or not, and he accomplishes it by resorting to cheap vaudeville. He does this, fully convinced in his own mind that his program is being weakened rather than strengthened, but the public must be humbugged into believing that they are getting full value for the extra charge, and cheap, tawdry vaudeville, fit only for the groundlings, is exalted at the expense of the moving picture.

Is it not high time to protect the moving picture from such contemptuous treatment?

If cheap vaudeville possesses the extra drawing qualities that these exhibitors blind themselves and the public into believing, in order to grasp an extra nickel, would it not be equitable to relieve them of the burden of the despised picture and compel them to give an exclusive bill of cheap vaudeville?

If this alternative were offered such exhibitors, it is safe to state in advance that not a man of them would stake his money on exclusive cheap vaudeville. Experience has taught them that the program must have moving pictures in order to win out.

It is worthy of comment that picture theatres with regular patrons—such theatres being usually located in residential neighborhoods—have eliminated cheap vaudeville. The managers have learned that intelligent people cannot be misled as to the merits of cheap vaudeville. Indeed, they will have none of it, and avoid the picture theatres where it is offered as they would the pest. And is it to be wondered at, when thinly veiled vulgarity is made to serve as humor and century-old gags are resurrected to chase away melancholy?

The picture theatres catering to transient patrons are the chief offenders against the worth and dignity of the moving picture. When not injuring pictures by combining them with cheap vaudeville, they are maltreating them by inferior projection. In the management of such houses—there are always exceptions, of course—commercialism is the ruling motive.

There can be no denying the charge that these houses are a dead weight and a painful drag on the splendid progress being made by moving pictures. The exhibitions in them give thousands of people a wholly wrong impression of moving picture entertainment, the impression that it is cheap, common and dissatisfying. Disloyalty to the picture is advertised glaringly in all houses of this type. It must and will be combatted.

Possibilities of Musical Synchronization

By W. STEPHEN BUSH.

SYNCHRONIZATION, in the strict and literal sense, has so far been found impossible in connection with the moving picture. No instrument or contrivance has as yet been invented which in a satisfactory manner will supply the human voice just as its utterance is needed on the screen. Vast sums of money have been expended in the attempt to secure such synchronization and so-called talking pictures, run by machinery, had a short vogue and then lapsed into oblivion. The future may bring forth what now, in view of so many decided failures, seems imposible, but until the invention comes, it is quite possible to have with one important kind of opera a synchronization which, while not by any means strict and literal, is fraught with great possibilities for the moving picture entertainment.

In a former article, "Giving Musical Expression to the Drama," it was pointed out that in all the operas of Richard Wagner, from "Lohengrin" to "Parsifal" were to be found most valuable "motifs" for accompaniment of dramatic and tragic pictures.

If it were possible to make a musical adaptation of these operas the music would correspond exactly with the action on the screen. An attempt was made, two or three years ago, to render "Parsifal" into moving pictures. The Edison Company made the attempt, and it was done very creditably indeed. It did not seek to feature the musical part of it to a pronounced extent; at any rate there was no attempt even at musical synchronizing. Moreover, the moving picture audiences at that time were not ready for productions of this kind. It is only proper, however, to state that notwithstanding these facts the play had more than a fair run, and if the supply of lecturers then available had been larger the success would in all probability have been greater.

It is difficult to discuss the question of approximate musical synchronization of Wagnerian operas in the abstract and remain intelligible to the average reader, for whose benefit this paper is printed every week. A concrete example will make the matter perhaps somewhat plainer. Take for instance one of the most typically Wagnerian music-dramas, "Tristan and Isolde." Here the possibilities for moving picture adaptation with a number of strongly developed central themes from the opera as musical accompaniment lie on the surface. Just how the adaptation is to be made, the arrangement of all technical details, the necessary abbreviations in the text without loss of the musical "motifs," are matters for the expert playwright and the skilled musician. If the two last-named work together intelligently and both are possessed of some understanding of Wagner, theoretical as well as practical, the production of a great and attractive novelty in the moving picture field seems reasonably certain. Referring again to "Tristan and Isolde" as a fine Wagnerian type, it is of course plain to every student that, beside the development of the leading themes or motives, there would also have to be some scenic music, such for instance as that of the sailors in the first scene of the play mentioned. The repetitions of the thematic ideas—the motifs—are then more than a mere accompaniment, but are converted into a most potent expression of the drama.

Of course such a method of synchronization, as here most roughly and superficially indicated, would never extend to the singing, nor would vocal synchronization be necessary to complete the scheme. The latter would present sufficiently interesting and novel and entertaining points without vocal synchronization.

It is pertinent here to quote Wagner on the subject. In his Art-Work he says:

"By completing each other in changeful play, the sister arts will disport themselves together in pairs or singly, as is required by the dramatic art, which alone prescribes the measure and intention. Now the plastic move of the actors pause to follow the passionless musing of thought, now the thought comes forth to life and finds direct form in the gesture, now the stream of feeling, the thrill of wonder will be rendered by music alone, now all three in common will carry out the will of the drama."

The sister arts here spoken of by Wagner are music, drama, and acting. A finer and clearer definition of the correlation of these arts has rarely been given in ancient or in modern times. "Wagner," says one of his older biographers, "endeavored to make the libretto a consistent drama, but always suitable to the emotional expressiveness of music. He shows how the development of a drama should lead to periods of emotional exaltation or technically emotional situations, in which the expressiveness of melody would be employed with all its resources to enforce the poet's thoughts."

What could be more interesting and instructive and useful to all who are concerned in the future of the moving picture than these words of Wagner: "In the drama we must become knowers through feeling if we have and keep the open mind, the eloquence of music will do the rest."

Mark well the words "the eloquence of music." Would not this eloquence of music, as it is found in richest veins in Wagner, be wonderfully effective on the silent stage, if properly prepared and adapted? What manufacturer, in alliance with musical skill and genius, will give us the first example of the possibilities of instrumental synchonization of Wagnerian opera?

More Light on the Moving Picture League of America.

President Neff writes as follows to the editor of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD:

"I wish to thank you for the splendid report in your journal of the Cleveland meeting. Our organization is new, and all the members practically strangers to each other; still we have made excellent progress so far. As we become better acquainted and the exhibitors throughout the country realize and appreciate the objects of the League, I am sure that the best friendship and cooperation will result among all concerned. Personally I will say to you that the officers of the Moving Picture Leaugue of America are governed only by fair and impartial motives and that they are anxious to bring about harmony in all branches of the moving picture business. The lure of the Almighty Dollar has warped some of our instincts. The motto "Get All You Can, While You Can" should be substituted by the motto "A Higher Standard and the Elevation of the Business." The motion picture business is not for a day, week, month or year, but for years and all time to come.

"We are not organized for the purpose of fighting any branches of the film business, but for the sole purpose of protecting the rights and interests of all bona fide moving picture exhibitors, and to promote the welfare of all. The manufacturers and the exchanges, all of them, at no distant day will discover the great benefits to be derived from a thorough organization of the exhibitors.

"Again thanking you, and with kindest regards, I remain,

"Very truly yours,
"M. A. NEFF."

Reviews of Notable Films

"JIMMIE AS A FOOTMAN" (Gaumont).

Reviewed by Jas. S. McQuade.

JIMMIE, the inimitable, will be seen in a new and attractive role early in October, when George Kleine will release the Gaumont film, "Jimmie as a Footman." The length is about 1,150 feet, but the extra 150 feet will be welcomed, as the pictured story shows the triumphant vindication of our favorite boy actor under extremely trying circumstances, and there is not a redundant scene in the film.

Jimmie's acting, in this instance, has the same convincing quality that stamps all his characters. There is nothing fictitious about this miniature footman, and if he is a little "stuck up," by reason of his long tailed coat, with its attractive trimmings and bright brass buttons, is it not because Jimmie has discovered the weakness of footmen in matters sartorial, and has succeeded admirably in simulating their pompous manner and dignified air?

The scene at Jimmie's home, where he is charged with theft by the marchioness and her female detective, is spirited and forceful. There is nothing of bravado about it; just the expression on face and in gesture of the white heat of anger pent up within. When the prying detective proceeds to search the bed for the stolen article, we are not surprised to see Jimmie drive both women out, using his rag-picking hook as a weapon.

The views are all finely photographed, the interiors, which predominate, being soft and the details well defined.

Jimmie is the only son of a poor widow. He secures the position of footman with a noble family and contributes to the support of his mother and sister. One of the opening scenes shows Jimmie on a visit to his home. He proudly turns over his savings to his mother and then hurries back to his quarters in the big mansion.

One day the marchioness, his mistress, chances to leave a valuable bracelet in the touring car. It is found by the chauffeur. Instead of restoring it to the owner he puts it in his pocket. Search is made for the jewel by the marchioness and her household without avail. Then she decides to call in a detective.

The servants are unaware that the new maid is the woman detective in disguise. From the outset the female Sherlock Holmes suspects Jimmie. One day, while the servants are at lunch, she attempts to examine the contents of a pocket in his coat, which has been placed on the back of a chair, near her seat at the table. Jimmie, who is sitting opposite, observes the act and raps her smartly on the knuckles of the offending hand with his table knife. The incident makes her more determined than ever to prove him the thief.

Soon afterwards Jimmie pays a secret visit by night to his mother and sister. He is followed by the detective and the marchioness. Through the keyhole they see him delivering his wages to his mother and embracing her and his sister affectionately. Notwithstanding this evidence of filial devotion, the detective is convinced that Jimmie is the guilty one. The squalid conditions of his home strengthen her belief that he is the criminal.

Jimmie is about to depart when the marchioness and the detective enter. He is astonished at the visit, but does not overlook offering a chair to his mistress. Then the marchioness charges him with stealing her bracelet and is strongly supported by the detective, who seeks to bear him down by an avalanche of words. Scornfully he denies the charge and manfully faces his accusers. The climax is reached when the detective attempts to examine the bedtick. Jimmie seizes her hand, thrusting her away from the bed, orders both women from the house. Particularly enranged at the detective, he seizes a rag-picking hook and beats her as she rushes out.

The chauffeur, in the meantime, has been casting soft glances on the new maid, never suspecting her real occupation. Shortly after the scene at Jimmie's home, the detective receives a letter from him, in which he declares that he is in love with her and will call to ask for her hand. She is mortified at the brusqueness of the man and receives him with no show of favor. He is about to leave in ill humor, when a sudden whim seizes him and he returns to the supposed maid. He offers her the stolen bracelet as a gift, after which she melts in smiles and sends him away happy in dreams of the morrow.

Hastily she seeks the marchioness and presents her with the lost jewel. Simultaneously both women think of the wrong done Jimmie and at once set out for his home. They find him proud and distant in manner, and it is only after the marchioness shows him the lost bracelet and begs forgiveness that he softens and submits to her caresses. But the detective she keeps at arm's length. No kisses from her for him. The only sign of relenting shown her is the offer of a single finger in a handshake.

And then virtue is rewarded. Jimmie is appointed steward of the household of the marchioness, and his mother and sister are engaged as servants. The dishonest chauffeur, meanwhile, had been taken in charge by officers of the law.

THE WINDS OF FATE (Edison).

This latest Edison film is a most acceptable interpretation of the winds of fate. The old saying: "It is an ill wind that blows no good," is here exemplified in both its positive and negative sense. A banker places six negotiable bonds in the hands of his manager, the wind through a suddenly opened door blows one away—unnoticed—and it is carried beneath a piece of furniture. Later, when the six bonds are called for, one is missing; of course the manager is misjudged and discharged. Without work and without character, poverty is the gloomy outlook for his family. Walking down the street the son of the unfortunate manager has his cap carried away by a gust of wind, which he chases to the mouth of a sewer, where, in addition to securing his cap, he finds a pocketbook filled with bills. The lucky find brings joy to the little home until it is discovered that the money belongs to the banker. Honesty overcomes the bitterness of poverty and the boy is sent to the banker's office to restore the pocketbook; of course the banker is astonished at this honor on the part of his late employee, and while writing upon the desk from which the bond was blown, the suddenly opened door causes a gust of wind to carry the note he was writing right where the missing bond lies. Its strange recovery carries its own explanation, the banker sees the error of his hasty judgment and restores the manager to his position with an honor which carries happiness to the home. The whole forms a most creditable story; it is a strong lesson on the value of honesty even in the face of distress; many a youth may be helped by its lessons, also many a hasty opinion may be withheld. Not only do the "Winds of Fate" prove kind, but honesty is shown to be the best policy and honor is above all value.

THE CODE OF THE HILLS (Vitagraph).

This forthcoming Vitagraph film is somewhat new. A Kentucky mountain story, "The Code of the Hills" is a reversal of the "unwritten law." In the "unwritten law" a woman's honor is defended, any abuse thereof means death. In the "Code of the Hills" a woman avenges the murder of her husband by a former rival for her affections. The story as told being an old love feud, in which the rejected lover takes the life of his successful rival, who is able to write the name of his slayer on a piece of maple bark before he expires. The young widow treasures this maple bark note as evidence of the guilt of her former admirer, awaiting occasion to avenge her husband, which she is successful in accomplishing after two years. She has no sooner fired the fatal shot than the sheriff, having heard the report, intercepts her. With defiance she produces the maple bark note and convinces the sheriff of the justice of her act according to the "Code of the Hills." The sheriff yields to the exigencies of the occasion and takes the dead man's revolver from his belt, fires one shot from it, and then places it in the hand of the dead man as if to indicate that he had himself fired the fatal shot, either in suicide or in an attack of which he became the victim.

This strangely chivalrous act of the sheriff is new; he endorses the act of the woman, as, according to the "code" side of the "unwritten law," it is not legal, but human from the viewpoint of the people of the "Hills." While this is a double tragedy, it is so presented that there are no gruesome features; it is presented with the Vitagraph care for a clean picture, and as tragedies form a necessary part of life portrayals, when presented in this manner they are free from criticism and censure. The value of the picture is enhanced by the scenery, which is typical of the title of the play and naturally very picturesque.

"WHEN TWO HEARTS ARE WON" (Kalem).

When an actor of the standing of Sidney Drew lends his distinguished talents to the photoplay the event is notable, and then, when the vehicle in which he makes his appearance is no less than one of his own successful sketches which has delighted audiences on two continents, "When Two Hearts Are Won," our respectful attention is at once commanded. This sketch might, with no great stretch of imagination, be termed a modern version of "Taming of the Shrew." Alcibiades Shamley marries Cassandra, a beautiful young girl with a temper and a determination to have her own way with things in general, also she is devoted to a pet dog of diminutive proportions, called Cara.

After the wedding the pup is prepared for the bridal tour with great ceremony, but the rules of the Pullman Car Company forbid dogs being carried on their coaches, so the Shamleys are put off the train. At the hotel accommodations are refused because of a rule against dogs, but the Shamleys manage to find a resting place in the Railroad Hotel by bribing the clerk to admit the dog.

Here the pup makes trouble by chewing up the maid's hat.

During these events Alcy has been getting telegrams from his wife's folks warning him against her violent temper, the last one being from her Uncle David which advises Alcy to give her some of her own medicine. Previous events convince Alcy that it is now time to assert himself, so he takes Uncle David's advice and starts in to mix things up on the pretense that the pup has swallowed his collar button. By the time he has wrecked the place Cassandra is completely subdued and asks Alcy's forgiveness.

The appearance of Mr. Drew in pictures marks a further step in advance in the progress of the photoplay. Though serving his apprenticeship on the legitimate stage, he early elected to cast his lot with vaudeville, in which field he has gained a reputation and a position equal to that held by his distingushed brother John Drew, the dramatc star. To many patrons of the pictures his features will be familiar. His performance before the camera could not have been more satisfactory had he served a long apprenticeship in the picture studio.

Good photography and snappy action throughout make this picture one of the most interesting of next week's licensed releases and a feather in the cap of the Kalem Company.

Possibilities of the Film

By Edward R. Higgins, Staff Artist, Chicago Inter-Ocean.

May an outsider be permitted a few critical remarks anent the moving picture business? Frankly, I believe few producers realize the possibilities of the film. The art of the photoplay is yet in its infancy. Development is bound to come. There are producers, notably the Selig, Vitagraph and Edison companies, whose work is generally excellent. Others occasionally publish fine pictures, but do not keep continually up to a high standard. Like the author, the artist or the actor, the film manufacturer will be judged by his poorest product.

In these modern days of competition there is no room for mediocrity in film manufacture or anything else. The creative faculty never stands still—it must advance or retrograde. The motion picture has reached a high standard of mechanical perfection—a splendid vehicle for artistic expression. Yet day after day we see the same grade of mediocre photoplays produced throughout the country, with only an occasional redeeming film here and there.

Are American film producers satisfied with the present quality of their wares? Will their splendid business opportunities be run into the ground with penny wise economies, cheap melodrama and comedy continually rehashed, inartistically arranged, poorly acted, the same old things over and over again?

There is no mystery about public taste in the photoplay. People have become surfeited with monotony. Horse play and vulgarity cannot last. Audiences are sick of "Western Drama"—of the same old daughter of the same old sheriff and the same old gallant cow-punching gentlemen. Variety is needed and is essential to business development. Variety in class of films—fiction, history, travel, industry, science, trick films, etc. Variety in composition and arrangement of scenes—tinting and coloring. Variety in plot and locale of stories. Variety in type of actors.

With all literature to call on for a plot, why do film producers putter around with cheap scenarios? One doesn't need to turn to a Shakespeare, a Dante or a Milton for spectacular ideas. The shelves of any library are filled with available scenarios; clever, strong, educational, uplifting stories which would grip and hold an audience. History is filled with available incidents for the photoplay. Some of the finest films ever produced are of this class—a reproduction of actual events. Surely more intelligent use could also be made of current happenings in which the camera has the advantage in competition with magazines and newspapers.

Travel pictures offer logically a splendid chance for the camera man, but are frequently disappointing owing to poor judgment in view selection. Architecture and landscape, when artistically taken, are desirable, but must be supported with the human element. Foreign people, their markets, crowds on principal streets, their industries and amusements are tremendously interesting.

The marvels of science are almost new territory for the moving picture. Natural history, botany, chemistry, etc., are an inexhaustible supply of material. An occasional trick film, if well done, is a welcome change from the sameness of the motion picture show. Why are they apparently dying out? Experiments along this line should be valuable educators for the camera man.

In scenic arrangement the average director is manifestly deficient. More or less he is groping blindly for his effects. Stage craft, with its traditions, set pieces, painted scenery and stereotyped effects, is the bane of the picture.

An artist, preferably an illustrator, should be employed as assistant to the director for the working out of effects. The photoplay is a series of pictures—not a stage. The rules of composition and balance, arrangement of light and shade, etc., are essential to a perfect picture. The French understand this fact, and we have seen some remarkable applications of principles of composition in their films.

However, aside from technical training, the use of common sense would improve the average scene. Interiors are habitually stagy—cluttered with cheap furniture, pictures, etc., and obviously made up. Landscape is more often than not poorly chosen. Directors might with advantage have men out making kodak records of promising landscape and architectural bits for future reference. As action of players close to the camera has proven effective, it is being worked to death. Variation in distance from camera is desirable.

Tinted and colored films always make pleasing variety. While the new color process may not be available to the general producer, much can be done along other lines. The tinting of films should be studied and the natural color tone of the scene reproduced as far as possible. For example, the warm glow of the artificial light of a ball-room, the brown tones of the autumnal landscape the blue greens of the sea. Such effects would be economical and pleasing if subtly used.

For spectacular pictures a combination of hand coloring and the tinting bath should give good results. In coloring film by hand, color scheme for each scene should be laid out by a competent artist. Speed of production would be obtained according to number of operators employed. Each operator handling only one color on six replicas of film, working with enlarging glass, if necessary, would develop almost printing press time. The general effect would depend on the excellence of original color scheme and careful supervision of operators. Enterprising producers cannot afford to be without an efficient color department.

There is no profession so crowded with talent as the stage. Good actors are open for engagements at all times, particularly during the summer months—the best season for the camera man. Would not the employment of a good company of real actors with a well-known star for leads, be a paying investment if economically done? Surely it would attract new and desirable custom and give prestige and publicity to the producer. It would also raise the status of the present photoplayers as well as the photoplay itself. The present practice of not publishing cast by name on film is a mistake and cheapens the actors taking part .

The time is at hand for the motion picture press agent. Producers must have publicity bureaus sooner or later. An evil they may be, but a necessity they are to any large amusement enterprise. Already producers are becoming known to the public. A Selig, an Edison or a Vitagraph film will attract custom simply because their names stand for excellence of product. How much more would this be the fact with judicious publicity?

The time is coming when competition will be strenuous for excellence of workmanship, regardless of expense. A single inferior product will immeasurably cheapen the prestige of a producer. If there is a call for low grade films they should be published under a different name.

The Ever Potent Moving Picture.

ALTHOUGH the vogue of the motion picture has brought about the erection of more than ten thousand theaters, varying in seating capacity from 200 to 5,000, in the last decade, the managers and owners of legitimate theaters in this country cannot truthfully claim that this condition has conspired to reduce the patronage extended to the higher priced stage offerings.

It is fairly estimated that fifteen million new theater-goers in the United States and Canada have been created from a public originally attracted through the lure of the camera man, and fully one-half of these had never been inside of a playhouse before, while the other half, having become accustomed to visiting the moving picture resorts, have contracted the habit of theater going from a desire to see in the flesh, players and singers whose portrayals have been reproduced for them through science and artifice in the picture theaters.

The phonograph, also, has played a vital part in solving the problem of grand opera. Thousands of persons to whom the inside of the Metropolitan Opera House was an unknown spectacle, have found their way to the box-office through having heard the arias of popular operas as sung by the world's greatest singers, whose vocal records have been preserved through the various phonograph devices.

This is so true that impresarios and theatrical managers are no longer found resenting the procedure by which the players and singers under engagement to them add materially to their incomes by posing and singing for the film makers and phonograph inventors.

One would suppose that the world's greatest artists would refrain from temptation in this respect, but it is a fact that Enrico Caruso's income from his vocal records is quite as large as that which comes from his grand opera achievements, and, undoubtedly, he is solaced during his prolonged period of inactivity on the operatic stage by the knowledge that his royalties from the phonograph companies will go on perpetually, though there are those who believe that his present vocal incapacity is greatly due to overtaxing his voice in the effort to preserve his vocal records for future generations—a declaration that will be confirmed by any one who has ever been present at the seances, nerve-racking as they are.

The spectacle of such exalted players as Rejane, Jane Hading, Mounet-Sully and the younger Coquelin posing for the French film makers is not an unusual one, and all of the distinguished secretaries of the exclusive Comedié Francáise have capitulated, in view of the enormous sums paid in an effort to raise the level of cinematography.

The plans of the foreign film makers are truly tremendous in scope. Some of these firms are capitalized in the millions and not all of them have repute in this country. In Italy, particularly, the artistic film is featured; the manufacturers have complete stock companies equal, if not superior to those of the subsidized theaters. The equipment is always lavish and an outlay of $50,000 to evolve a single series of pictures is common enough. These Italian films are just beginning to arrive in this country, and they have indeed created a furore.

Recently an English film company paid $25,000 for the privilege of reproducing the ballets presented in a London music hall. As these terpsichorean productions have always been regarded as too costly for transportation to this country, one may understand why so large a sum was willingly given, for in no other way would it be possible for American play-goers to view the entrancing spectacle which all privileged persons pronounced unapproachable.

The Messrs. Shuberts have been offered a still larger sum for the right to reproduce the Hippodrome spectacles. The idea of the film concern making the offer was that, as the Hippodrome offerings were too large to be presented in other cities, an effort to reproduce them for the public not available to the New York institution would not only pay them handsomely, but also would be regarded as a public spirited enterprise.

Right here let it be said that such a thing as public spirit among the film makers is not to be ridiculed. Thomas A. Edison's hobby is a desire to evolve educational films. He spends the greater portion of his leisure time in the picture houses, always endeavoring to conceal his identity, but this procedure on his part is so well known among his employees that they are instantly provided with an incentive for great effort.

Mr. Edison is firm in the belief that the moving picture theater of tomorrow will be a tremendous factor for the public good. Moreover, he thinks that the day is near when the workingman will be able to lay down his dime at the box office and witness a performance fully as good as that which is now seen in theaters where two dollars are paid for seats. At no distant date, "the wizard" prophecies a complete and perfect synchronism between the cinematograph and the phonograph, by which it will be possible to produce artificially complete plays, and even grand operas, with vocal sound, action, enunciation, and even color absolutely and scientifically reproduced—a veritable conquest of the arts of music and the drama.

Already it has been possible to witness the spectacle of a popular stage idol appearing in a theater where high prices of admission are charged, while, but a stone's throw away, a counterfeit presentation duplicating voice and action was on view at an admission price of five cents. It has also been possible to hear an act from Donizetti's "Lucia de Lamermoor" sung by Caruso, Sembrich, Plançon and Hosmer. The pictures depicting the stage action were perfect, but the synchronism with the phonograph was faulty; and it is this phase of the problem which Mr. Edison is now coping with, promising perfection at an early date.

An inventor in Holland has perfected a device along somewhat different lines, which reproduces the action, color and sound but not the voice vocally, merely the instrumental accompaniment. With this device an effort is shortly to be made to reproduce the Oberamergau Passion Play. The vital achievement in this instance is the conquest of color.

Mr. Edison believes that others than himself, investigating as they are the problems yet to be solved, will achieve astounding results which within two years will revolutionize the art of entertaining and which will result in moving picture theaters of prodigous size, where the masses will witness tremendous spectacles, operas and plays; even making it possible to bring to the picture screen Wagner's Trilogy as rendered at Bayreuth—with vocal, instrumental and orchestral effects synchronized with motor-color pictures—the whole forming a perfect counterfeit presentation of the great Cycle, to hear and see which it has been necessary to undergo a pilgrimage to the Bavarian city, at a monetary cost prohibitive to ninety-five per cent. of mankind.

What will be the effect on the singer and player in the flesh when science and artifice combine to make unnecessary their utilization for the portrayal of the great masterpieces of music and the drama? This is a phase of the problem which has yet to be reckoned with.

As a rule, population has provided a public capable of absorbing the problems created by progress, but it does not require any great wrench of the imagination for one to marvel as to how it will be possible to reconcile a public accustomed to pay $5.00 for its seats in an open house when the compelling forces of the attraction are duplicated for ten cents. Of course, the very rich will not be affected by even so revolutionary a change, for with them opera is a social fad; but in the last few years there has come into being a vast public whose incentive for opera-going has been the strictly musical —not the social side—the phonograph being a factor in the creation of this new public, will be likely to sustain the tenability of its position when the day comes for it to combine with the cinematograph in a bid for the patronage of the musical world.

The moving picture has by no means proved a menace to the theatrical profession. In fact, the spectacle of hundreds of idle actors and actresses, congregating in the "Rialto" because of disastrous tours, and other misfortunes, has been greatly mitigated through the great demand for their services from the film makers, who no longer can supply the demand for films through what are called "actualities," this has resulted in the photoplay, and there are no less than twenty complete and fully equipped stock companies in the vicinity of New York alone, each employing from twelve to twenty players. These are not always composed of the rank and file; some of our best known stage favorites have been content to avail themselves of the benefits to be derived.

The producers for the picture theaters are selected from the best known stage directors of the country. Charles Kent, producer for the Vitagraph Company, has been a Frohman star, while Francis A. Powers, who was producer for "Powers Picture Plays," (the similarity of names being a mere coincidence) is a distinguished author-actor whom Charles Frohman brought here from California to stage his own play, "The First Born," a work that created a sensation in New York.

Thus it will be seen that with the people of the stage intimately affiliated with the inventors of cinematography and the phonograph, no great upheaval will come to the rank and file in the event that Mr. Edison's optimistic prophecy is fulfilled. As to the stars and the thousand-dollars-a-night songbirds, undoubtedly there will always be a public prepared to rave over great individuality and to worship at the shrine of a great name.

Technique of the Photoplay

CHAPTER VII.

Drama and Romance.

Nothing is more dramatic than the sight of death; the sudden extinction of a human life, and yet death may be made absurd, even farcical, through its crude employment. Quite the funniest film of recent output was one in which every character came to a violent end, the story closing with the death of the sole survivor. It was not intended to be a farce, but it was more than that—it was pure burlesque.

There are living deaths far more dramatic, far more impressive, than any scene of final dissolution that can be made. Some themes are intensely dramatic with never a hint of death, and many a promising plot has been ruined by the beginner solely through indiscriminate slaughter, or even a single death, dragged in "to make it more dramatic."

One of the Edison releases dealt with a woman, the wife of a miserly farmer, who took the money belonging to the Ladies' Aid Society for the purpose of visiting her daughter, who lay near death. The husband would not give her the money, and it was the only way. On her return she was notified that the money was to be turned over to the minister on a certain Sunday. Her husband refused to make good the sum, and in the final scene she was shown sitting in her pew, waiting for the hymn to end and the moment for her confession to commence. It was a simple plot, yet far more tragic than a story made dramatic through the shooting of some character. Again, for example, a woman who has married against the advice of her family and friends, forsaking all to wed the man who has won her heart, only to find him utterly unworthy of her sacrifice. There are three broad developments of the story. She may leave him, she may kill him in a fit of desperation, or she may patiently live her life, accepting his abuse and neglect, always faithful to her vows, always hopeful for the turn of the tide that may bear the marital bark into pleasant waters.

Almost invariably the novice will accept one of the two solutions first mentioned. The experienced writer, accustomed to playing upon the emotions with gentle but practised hand, will realize that the third development is vastly more effective than either of the others, and will so appeal to sympathy that the audience is intensely absorbed instead of merely shudderingly thrilled for an instant.

The hot-blooded Mexican girl who "shoots up" her faithless sweetheart is flashily dramatic; crudely sensational, but the appeal is not as strong and the photoplay does not make the same lasting impression as is gained from the skilled handling of the basic theme, but in which the story is turned to show the jilted girl accepting with gentle resignation her loveless fate.

The woman who shoots her daughter's betrayer is a strenuously dramatic figure, but the gentle mother who makes sacrifice and endures privation and insult to ensure her daughter's happiness possesses the stronger appeal. Mother love, of all the emotions, is the most directly appealing when handled with skill, but the appeal must be made to the heart, not to the head, to be lastingly effective.

The flashy lithographed poster is more startingly effective than the tenderest work of some great artist, but the work of art will endure long after the lithograph is forgotten.

Variety Is Demanded.

It is not to be argued that all photoplays should follow one general line. Given a properly dramatic theme and reasonable excuse, the story involving appeal to the baser emotions may be made almost as acceptable as the more restrained story. Each has its place in the scheme of the photoplay, each theme provides contrast for the other and all styles of productions are in demand, but make certain that your plot has other excuse than the mere shedding of blood before you begin its development. If it has not that excuse, alter the plot until it becomes reasonable.

Ninety-five per cent. of the plots submitted for production show the lack of careful development, are lacking in those little touches which mark the difference between the production of series of incidents and the telling of a story of appeal. The careful writer does not work out the plot along the lines which first suggest themselves. It is the patient, plodding polisher who scores the solid success, and the writers whose work is in demand owe their position to the care with which a theme is developed.

The simplest theme may be made strongly dramatic by proper building up and the strongest plot left ineffective through lack of proper planning.

One Familiar Example.

One very familiar theme deals with the scapegrace sent West to "reform." He leads a wild life, but is brought to an orderly life through some keepsake that was the parting gift of his sweetheart. Usually he is seen to discover the keepsake, push away the drink or the woman that is at his elbow, and possibly in the next scene he takes train for back home, marries and presumably lives happily ever after.

The story is there, but its treatment is bald. It lacks the refining touch that makes it great. It interests for the moment and then it is forgotten until the next version is seen. It possesses no individuality. The old familiar incidents are rushed through to the anticipated conclusion and there is no suspense. This is in part due to the limitation of length of the reel, but more to careless development by author and producer. The incidents need to be emphasized, the appeal to the heart must be made. Immediate reformation is improbable and inartistic. Get the spectator interested in the man's efforts to live up to his determination. Dash hopes with an occasional backsliding; play upon the emotions until full strength comes, and when, in the last scene, the man takes the girl into his arms, the spectator who has hung breathless upon the varying developments feels assured that the troubles of the pair are over and that the reformation is complete.

Do not forget the girl in following the man. The stronger appeal will be made if the interest centers in the feminine figure and the audience is interested in the man because they want him to reform for the sake of the girl's happiness.

Show him in one of his moments of forgetfulness and then flash a short scene with the girl praying for the fulfilment of her hopes. Show pointedly that it is the girl's influence that holds him fairly straight and eventually works his salvation. In a word, do not merely tell what happened. Tell it so strikingly that you will make the story stand superior to all of the others written from the same theme.

Happy Endings Preferred.

Another grave error on the part of the novice is the belief that to be strong a story must end unhappily. There is but one of the popular magazines that habitually uses stories with unhappy endings. The demand is all for stories which please the reader, and only the morbidly inclined care for a succession of stories in which the reader is left with the regret that the ending has not been different.

There are some stories in which the climax is either unhappy or else inartistic, some plots which demand a tragic end, but it is neither necessary nor profitable to write these, and writers, more especially the beginners, will do well to leave the gloomy stories to others and make their own appeal with the story that, no matter what the happenings, brings a satisfied sigh of relief as the tangles are straightened out before the story's end.

Most stories are capable of an adroit twist which will settle all differences and bring the happy conclusion. They may not sound strong in the telling, they may lack the intensity of climax, but they will stand a much better chance of acceptance, and that, after all, is the true test. Success in authorship consists in writing what the market demands rather than what the author thinks it should demand.

The photoplay theater is a place of entertainment and should not be made the home of gloom. This does not mean that no appeal to the emotions should be made; the smile that follows the tear is the happier for the tears, but having brought the tears and smiles, having plunged the spectator into despair over his heroine, end with a smile that wipes away the tears and leaves him well content.

Classifications of the Drama.

The drama is divided into Tragedy, Drama, Melodrama and Comedy-Drama. The boundaries are too lightly marked to be clearly defined. The tragedy of Shakespeare becomes the melodrama of the Jargon theater through localization and translation into the Germanized Hebrew that forms the Yiddish jargon. In "The Jewish King Lear," for instance, the Shakesperean story is followed, but so entirely changed in treatment as scarcely to be recognized.

Most cowboy stories are melodramatic because they are elemental and violent. The ranchero who steals the girl he loves by force of arms and wins her love by virtue of his deeds of daring is but Othello in action instead of narrative. Comedy drama is merely melodrama with the comedy element made superior to the dramatic action, but, unlike true comedy, dependent upon the dramatic theme for interest and suspense. Simple drama occupies a place between melodrama and tragedy in that it lacks the violence of one and the loftiness of the other.

The classification of a script is unimportant so that the plot be virile, but as a general rule it is well to avoid the sordid and unclean, to keep the atmosphere wholesome and moral. Stories dealing with the lower walks of life, with thieves and thugs and the social outcast have but limited appeal. Such persons and places exist, but that is no reason why they should be employed. The clean minded young fellow who wins his way to success is a far more attractive figure than the shaking thief who pretends reform for the love of a Salvation Army worker and the young mechanic who keeps his face washed is to be preferred to the profligate scion of the newly rich whose occupation is seduction and the enrichment of saloon keepers.

Probability is Demanded.

While all photoplays should be reasonably probable, comedy permits some lattitude in this matter. The properly constructed photoplay offers none. A single false situation may destroy the probability of an entire play, one false note make jarring discord of the whole.

The play that depends for its existence upon an improbable situation should not be written, and yet it frequently happens that offering is made of a manuscript that would be impossible were probability demanded.

If a rich resident of New York City is threatened by a lunatic with sudden death he does not immediately pack up a few belongings and fly to Alaska. It is more probable that he would go to the nearest police station, procure the arrest of the insane person and obtain his incarceration in an asylum. If it is necessary to the story that the character should go to Dawson City some more probable reason for his presence in Alaska should be devised, and yet scores of manuscripts offer incidents no more probable than this.

If an officer in the army should receive an appeal from a personal friend asking him to form his company into an impromptu vigilance society to rescue a heroine when the sheriff and a single deputy might work as effectively, it is improbable that the officer would court dismissal from the service even to oblige the picture producer. A body of cavalry might be more picturesque than a sheriff in his shirt sleeves, but the story would be too improbable to gain respect.

Audiences are quick to detect inaccuracies and are apt to resent the implication that they are fools. Even when they cannot realize the exact fault they realize that there is something wrong and the story does not satisfy.

Before a story is finally typed for submission it is well to offer it to some intelligent friend for criticism. If the objections offered cannot be promptly met the story should be worked over until it does gain probability.

Minor points are of equal importance with the great. When the real criminal confesses, exonerating the innocent man who is in jail for the offense, his friends should not rush off to jail and procure his liberation. Either the Governor must issue a pardon or the case must be reviewed before some court of competent jurisdiction. A district attorney does not issue warrants but obtains them from a court. Similar points in medical practice, railroad work or any other line must be observed if a story is to gain credence.

Romantic Stories.

The romance differs from the dramatic story in that the love interest predominates. But a romance should not present a succession of scenes of love making. Kissing quickly becomes tiresome on the screen and most courtships seem absurd. It is better to make the story hinge upon the winning of the girl and write in the love making sparingly.

All the world loves a lover and is interested in his success, but the lover must be worth while to gain favor and the limply helpless suitor is as much to be avoided as the man who loves illicitly. Stories of the passion of a man for a married woman, or of a woman for a married man have no place in photoplay no matter how popular they may be on the dramatic stage. The preponderance of children among photoplay patrons is not the only reason why romance should be kept clean, for the photoplay makes its greater appeal to the clean minded, now that the lurid film is in a pleasing minority, and the best liked story is clean and decent.

Novelty in proposal, the ingenious surmounting of obstacles and the overcoming of opposition are the leading themes, but the possibilities of the love story are practically limitless, depending wholly upon the inventiveness of the author. The story of the unusual courtship is that most desired and a touch of comedy to relieve the burden of sentiment is advisable.

One great error is the belief that the romance ends with the marriage ceremony. There are many pretty romances which have their commencement where custom has decreed that romance ends. The field is worth while in that it is so little worked.

As a general thing it is well to hold the interest to the girl, though this rule does not always hold good, and it is always risky to place the girl in a false light. No one can get interested in a silly little fool. Make her wayward, but do not make her idiotic. Most love stories have been written, since love is the favored theme. It only remains to rewrite them interestingly and with as much novelty of incident as possible.

THE REX THEATER.

With the opening of the Rex Theater, at 6017 Penn Avenue, East End, Pittsburg, Pa., the public of the E. E. shopping district were given the opportunity of admiring moving pictures in one of the nicest moving picture houses in the city. This house is very elaborately finished both inside and out, so as to withstand the criticism of the most discriminating theater goer. The cool colors predominate in the decorative scheme, which is very effectively brought out. Everything has been done to insure perfect comfort to the moving picture fans that patronize this theater, the installation of the most perfect ventilating system in this city being one of the notable features. The seats are cozy, the floor being sloped toward the curtain, so that the picture may be seen, even over the picture hats that refuse to come off. Its seating capacity is 300. A regulation No. 2 asbestos booth with two No. 6 Powers machines provides the projection, which is exceptionally good. The throw is 110 ft. on a 15 x 18 curtain. A $5,000 electric organ, the largest in this city, is used only during the day; at night a uniformed six-piece lady orchestra furnishes the music. The program consists of three late run Independent films. Mr. Max W. Herring is the general manager and one of the owners.

Observations by our Man About Town

THERE is always something new in connection with moving pictures. If it is not something in the pictures themselves, it is so closely associated with them that any advantage to be gained goes to the pictures. The present generation cannot recall when the management of a theater and the occupancy of a pulpit were so closely brought together that the duties of both were performed by one person. Some years ago the clergy attempted to bring the patrons of the theater and worshipers at certain churches more closely together by holding religious services in the theaters on Sunday afternoon. That was the nearest approach to the innovation I had in mind when I spoke of something new. Miss Ida Mayer is the manager (or manageress) of a moving picture house at Jamaica, Long Island. The pastor of the Baptist church of that town is enjoying a vacation, so one Sunday Miss Mayer occupied his pulpit. She is an elocutionist and lecturer of some merit and handled the text "Be sure your sins will find you out" with no small degree of success.

I suppose the first thought some people will nurse is that this lady made an advertising medium of the pulpit, but she did not; her discourse was strictly in keeping with the duty assumed and the congregation to which she preached appreciated her efforts. Of course Miss Mayer did not escape criticism, for the reason that on the same day she occupied the pulpit, the show was going on at her picture house. Miss Mayer occupied the pulpit Sunday morning and Sunday night she looked after the picture house. In answer to her critics she said: "The incongruity is seeming, not real, for the work is good and helpful. My show is not of the so-called 'goody-goody' variety that palls. It is carefully planned to elevate the spectators, and the experiment has proved that people like clean motion pictures that entertain and instruct." Miss Mayer is the sister of Rev. G. E. Mayer, of the Grace Methodist Church, of Troy, N. Y.

My attention has been called to a recent article in Motography entitled "Lessons from Lyman Howe." I have known Mr. Howe for a number of years and he and his able corps of assistants, headed by that amiable and capable fellow, Sam Walkinshaw, deserve all the praises they can carry for their accomplishments toward the elevation of moving picture shows, but I think it is stretching a point to set what they have accomplished as an example for the general run of moving picture exhibitors. It is true that Mr. Howe is filling his house wherever he is at from twenty-five cents to a dollar or more and that he has no music but a piano, and has no songs or vaudeville; and that in big cities he changes his films but once a week. Now, "how does he get away with it?" The answer is: by careful, systematic preparation.

The writer says Howe's pictures are not different from other exhibitors' pictures. He is mistaken. The manager referred to sends to Europe every season a qualified representative (when he does not go himself), to select the cream of productions and many of the subjects thus selected could not be run with success in the ten and five cent theaters for the reason they are selected to appeal to the higher class of audiences—people seeking the classics, people who take delight in subjects of travel—in other words, people who look for an animated lecture platform and can afford to pay the prices that the outlay exacts. There is no atmosphere of mystery in connection with the success of the entertainments in mind. It is simply a matter of superiority, in selection, arrangement, production and desire.

One great advantage the Howe management has is the opportunity to rehearse and perfect. The writer says Mr. Howe changes his films but once a week. Grant that. How can a house that changes its program, twice, three times or more a week perfect music and props as he does? He may change his program but once a week, but the subjects are not strange to his people. They handle them many times during a season and are well acquainted with them before the season starts. Mr. Howe and his people are not bothered by first, second or third runs. All runs look alike to them and they have the handling of them to perfection. They do not care what comes out on Monday, Tuesday, or any other day in the week. They have their own programs and nothing is put on until it is thoroughly understood. Some of his men have practiced as long as two weeks on a picture to get the music and props perfect. It is well enough to say use sound effects as Howe uses them, but where is there a ten or five cent house that can get in touch with the subjects far enough in advance to do it. When the time comes that film exchanges can afford to let a house use subjects long enough to attain that result and charge for the films only during the period that the projection is in accord with it we will see the real thing; but the present competition will not permit this. While one man is rehearsing a picture his competitor is getting in the first, second or third run and the audiences shrug their shoulders and say, "Yes, he puts the pictures on fine, but why does he not get them on sooner. I would prefer seeing something new."

* * *

The Motography correspondent is in error when he says "his (Howe's) projecting machine is so geared that it may be speeded up until the train appears to be running down grades and around corners at a frightful speed." I saw the same thing done the other night by a most ordinary operator. He had a date arranged and he couldn't grind the last reel fast enough. Lordy, how dat train did run! Mr. Howe's machines are geared like all others, with the exception of those used in the kinemacolor productions. He uses the Powers machine and it is the operator who regulates the speed so that the train in the picture goes some.

Speaking of operators, I think those employed by Mr. Howe are entitled to some credit for the success of his entertainments. They may not be any better than some operators who have to "grind," but I have personal acquaintance with most of them and I know they are selected in the same careful and systematic manner that the subjects are. Yes, of course, they get better salaries than most nickelodeon operators, and they are worth it. I will cite one case. I know of one operator who never allows his machine to go back to the factory it came from unless the mechanism must be practically rebuilt. Each operator carries parts of the mechanism and is competent to repair the machine. Their remuneration inspires a pride in their work and they are qualified to command it.

A motor boat launched at Alexandria, Va., last week attained a speed exceeding fifty miles an hour on its first trial trip. That's going some. This is not a yachting or nautical item. Reference is made to it here because the boat is owned by Mr. J. Stuart Blackton, vice-president and secretary of the Vitagraph Company of America. He intends to try for first honors in the international motor boat races this summer. The boat will be known as Vita II. It is a 32-footer and 400 horsepower.

It is stated that the Borough of Bronx has one hundred and thirty-six show places. Of these forty-three are open-air places, which leaves ninety-three winter places, most of which are moving picture houses.

* * *

A movement is on foot in New Jersey to have the next legislature create a State Board of Censors, with power to pass on all films before they are exhibited in public. There is in existence a National Board of Censors comprising men of unquestionable qualifications for just that kind of work. Why not create a branch of that body in New Jersey and have it outside of politics?

* * *

Somebody has stated in an interview that motion picture posing is about the only line of theatrical activity where makeup, face powder and tints count for almost nothing. Well, I'll swear that most of the men and women I have seen in the pictures were not born that way.

Racing the Film.

World Man Observes Horrible Example at Boston Theater, Chicago—"Crusaders" in 27 Minutes.

By C. Young.

Friday and Saturday, August 18th and 19th, the World's Best Film Company's release, "The Crusaders, or Jerusalem Delivered," was shown at the Boston Theater on Madison Street. I saw it projected twice in succession, and once the following afternoon, and I am free to confess that never in my life before have I seen such a magnificent film so utterly ruined in its projection. Reel after reel of it was jerked through the machines, and the picture on the curtain was a fluttering series of jumps, exits and entrances, for the films got no chance to explain their meaning either by sub-titles, or through the acting. Fast, faster, faster, seemed to be the cry of the manager to the operators, and the operators responded ignobly. Here are the actual times of running of the reels (the entire film is about 3,600 feet long):

Series I, 7:52 to 8:04.....12 minutes
Series II, 8:04 to 8:15.....11 minutes
Series III, 8:15 to 8:23..... 8 minutes
Total for the 3,600 feet.....31 minutes

This was followed by a violinist, whose act may be passed over except for the fact that it was not hastened or curtailed, and then by a slide, "Three Minutes Intermission." As usual, the intermission was about 6 minutes, and then, after a spot song of no great merit, the Crusaders commenced to race again. They made somewhat better time at this show, as the following figures indicate:

Series I, 8:40 to 8:50.....10 minutes
Series II, 8:50 to 8:58..... 8 minutes
Series III, 8:58 to 9:07..... 9 minutes
Total .....27 minutes

Isn't this a grand showing? The operators must have been trained for a sausage factory; if they were not, then their training here would eminently fit them for such work as grinding up "Poor Fido."

The people realized that the pictures were not at fault, but the theater manager and operators, and on all sides were heard such remarks as: "The pictures are good, but they run them too fast"; "They ought not to go so fast"; "Speed 'em up, old man!" etc. One man did cry out, in no subdued tones, after commenting on the speed to his companions, "Faster!" At this, the speed dropped a trifle, the operator possibly having heard it, or the manager having realized a little of the discontent among the audience. But the high speed was soon resumed, and was kept up until I came away. The operators seemed to seize upon each opportunity they could to increase the speed, even above the furious rate the film was traveling, and when the scene of the "Saracens" retreat and the Crusaders' pursuit flashed on it was a farce, every figure fairly whizzing across the screen.

Two machines were used to project the films, and one of them was so poorly anchored to the floor that at every turn of the crank the picture, frame and all, would execute a jig about the screen. The machines used are Standard Automatics, and it is a high compliment to them that they will project any kind of picture at all at such speed.

Saturday afternoon, I saw the same film, and the same sort of performance went on again, though not quite so fast, as follows:

Series I, 2:07 to 2:20.....13 minutes
Series II, 2:20 to 2.29..... 9 minutes
Series III, 2:29 to 2:41.....12 minutes

Evidently the operators' arms were tiring from the terrific strain of turning a crank and pulling a film and takeup for so many hours daily. If they should take a vacation, I would suggest for their diversion some such light exercise as turning a hand windlass on a portable derrick for a change.

Seriously, though, this thing of excessive speed is an outrage to the motion picture business as a whole, and to the independent faction of it in particular. It is a disgrace to the independents that the only theater showing their films in the "Loop" is such a one as this, whose manager's only thought is to entice the people in and to chase them out. This policy is just as short-sighted as it possibly can be, and it doesn't always get them out. Many people who stay for a second show no doubt do so in the faint, too often vain, hope that at the next show the film will be run at a proper rate of speed. When they do go away, they go with a pretty well formed impression in their minds as to the length of the manager's ears and the determination never to go to that place again.

It will be noticed above that the time between the ending of the film at one show and the flashing of the title at the next was about 17 minutes—more than half the time given to showing the film altogether. Is this the sort of thing to make people patronize a theater? Most decidedly it is not. People go to a picture theater to see pictures, and not to listen to mawkish love songs and fourth-rate vaudeville acts, and when their enjoyment of the pictures, for which they paid their admission, is lessened by rapid running and other things on the program, it seems that they are really cheated out of their money, and given something for which they did not pay.

There is a way to check this fast running, and it is very simple. The operators' union in Chicago is pretty strong, and if its officials were to say to the theater manager, "You shall not force our men to run over the normal speed," the managers could not say, "Speed her up, Bill; there's a crowd waiting" every time ten people are held at the door. Such an action on the part of the union would not work to anyone's harm; it would give the Chicago operators as good a reputation as those of the Pacific Coast and San Francisco, and the standard of projection generally would be raised thereby. The displaying of the operators' union slide on the screen would also be a guaranty to the audience that the show was run right, and the patron could go to such a show with the assurance of seeing what he paid to see.

A striking example of what good projection will do was going on almost next door, at the Alcazar Theater, at the same time. This house, though it has a larger seating capacity than the Boston, was holding out a crowd larger than the one next door. Nevertheless the show was not rushed or curtailed. Two songs and two reels constituted the program offered, the Vitagraph Monthly, first run, and a second run Pathe. Not a long program, it might be said.

Those who went to the Alcazar got their money's worth, because the films were properly projected. They were not hurried, not even hastened a bit, and were clear, steady, brilliant and satisfying. Also they were really new films—first and second run. The films of the Crusaders at the Boston were by no means in first-class condition. The entire length of the first title and sub-title of the first reel was very rainy, and the rest of the film showed rain all the way through, not to mention the misframe patches, of which there were several. Some exchanges will furnish a commercial service with films in better condition than this really great feature film was. This policy of keeping the film booked for every possible day will prove a boomerang to the owners of the State rights, for exhibitors will not pay the high price asked for this to get a rainy film.

PALMYRA'S PARK PICTURE SHOW.

Hon. Pliny T. Sexton, a regent of the State of New York and one of the oldest citizens of Palmyra, N. Y., has established a very practical public amusement in that city, of which motion pictures form a prominent part. A few years ago Mr. Sexton improved and beautified a large property in the heart of the city which he threw open to the public under the name of Union Club Park. The Palmyra Band was engaged to give a concert every Saturday evening; swings were installed for the little children and comfortable chairs and seats for the older ones. Fountains and plants added to the beauty of the place. On Sunday afternoons a union church service was held in the park, organ and song books being furnished by Mr. Sexton.

Recently Mr. Sexton decided to open a picture show for the children in the park and, after consulting with the manager of the opera house, Harry L. Averill, who was running a successful picture theater in Palmyra, the necessary equipment was purchased and a free exhibition is given every Tuesday and Thursday evenings under the direction of Mr. and Mrs. Averill. A piano has been installed in the band stand at which Mr. E. Twadell, the "cyclone pianist," presides. Miss Iva Davis sings the illustrated songs. The pictures are of the highest order of merit and the popularity of the venture is proved by the fact that 2,000 persons are frequently in attendance.

Hugh E. Keogh, of the Chicago Tribune, avers that this scenario, as evidence of what the moving picture was doing to them, was actually offered a Chicago producer:

"Woman given present of a pair of earrings. She goes to brook to wash clothes. One earring drops in water. Despair! She decides to commit suicide by hanging from a limb of a tree over brook. Rope breaks. Falls in water. In clutching for support in water she grabs fish. Shock of water brings her to her senses. She decides to cook and eat fish. When she cuts it open she finds earring. Joy."

Music for the Picture

By CLARENCE E. SINN

VEOLA THOMPSON, of Portland, Ore., writes: "Way out West in wigwams and blankets we are beating our tum tums for the so-called discriminating public whose eyes gleam with delight as we play 'Hot Time in the Old Town To-night,' where one grand comedy fracas takes place and 'You're All Right If You've Only Got the Money' on a Hebrew comedy. But art, how saddening thou art—to the picture pianist who, after years of application finds his ideals so little valued. When we introduce such compositions as Friske movement from Liszt's 'Rhapsodie Hongroise No. 2,' the Allegro from Harold's 'Zampa' overture, etc., on wild and exciting situations; 'Stradella' on the murderous and in addition music of all nationalities according to situations. It is heart 'rendering' (that's the way they try out lard) to have a nice pulchritudinous woman remark, 'that Annie Rooney you played was just lovely. Of course the other music was all right, but what a genius the drummer is; I laughed my sides off when he made that kee-kee sound with that whistle. My! they must pay him a big salary.' This is all well and good where the Irish cook receives the attentions of the policeman—'Oh, Bedelia, I'd like to steal you,' and the 'Irish Washerwoman' if a dance is introduced, but wouldn't Beethoven rise up in his grave could he but hear some of the so-called realistic effects. If you are delivering lines from 'The Bells,' ring a cow bell all through—it will help people to understand. I want to call attention to the misuse of the 'Rosary.' Why do singers and musicians appropriate this song when depicting a monastery scene? The poem refers to a romance and 'each bead is a tender love.' (True. The song is a love song and not a religious; yet the music is of such a purely religious character that one can almost forgive its misuse in this direction occasionally.—C. E. S.)

"As you have previously written, what can be finer than 'Aida' in the Cleopatra line? Previous to your most interesting discussion on this peculiar line of scenario I had played Pryor's 'Egyptian Love Dance,' on a picture of this foreign type. I experimented with various compositions before deciding upon the aforesaid, and they were like the board who said to the plane, 'I don't like your style—you rub abainst my grain.' The Pryor number seemed to be the only one adapted to the action. Upon reading your opinion I felt compensated. Two heads are always better than one.

"There is an inborn taste regarding suitable music which by hard study and reading can attain to wonderful conceptions. The field is one endless chain without the customary financial fund as a premium. Our art is gulped down as Jonah did the whale. Brother, the musicians are the Jonah and the audience is the whale. Oh, these people. Is it any surprise pianists do not take more interest in picture playing? Other fields offer greater recompense. Is it fair to bill and feature vocalists and forget the musician? The latter sits in darkness; he is unknown. A green vest and yellow tie are his only marks of distinction from the janitor. Musicians ask for glory as well as other artists. He is not in business for the coin alone. Good pianos, good light and your name on the front of the house means something. Without publicity we might as well put on our bonnets and stroll out to our tent. . . . To musicians who for their own personal benefit desire to manifest intelligence in picture music I add that your suggestions are of great assistance, and way out West in our wigwams we derive much that is good out of that article called 'Music for the Picture.'"

Mrs. Thompson is well known on the Pacific coast as a pianist, entertainer and exhibitor. Having experience in the managerial part of the business her opinions ought to have some weight. As to the proposition mentioned in the last part of the letter, it seems to me that when the music is far enough out of the ordinary to be a drawing card, the man who is paying for it would advertise it along with his other attractions. That's business. But why should he pay for such advertising unless the subject thereof can bring a substantial return in dollars and cents? I believe there are a few piano players in the country who have made their work worth featuring and are being featured accordingly. Advertising must be paid for by somebody, and if the musician wants the manager to dig for it, he must first show the said manager why.

Star Theater, De Kalb, Ill., says: "I have read the Moving Picture World with much interest, especially the music department. I have played in the 'Star' for a year and a half and in that time have made quite a collection of cue music, but am always glad to get something new. Will you please tell me where I can get the book you mention as published in England. (August 12th, page 370)? If you happen to see 'In the Sultan's Garden' (Imp), how would you play it? I think pictures that carry a story of two or more countries are hardest to play, and play the patriotic music in the right place to make the best effect. In sad dramas I use slow waltzes, reveries, and things of that sort and vary the tempo and expression to suit the scene. Don't you think there is sometimes a better effect made by stopping the music, as in a quiet death scene? (Pauses in the music are often effective when introduced with discretion. I have frequently given examples of such on this page.—C. E. S.) Could you tell me the names of some good waltzes? I have about six hundred copies of that kind of music; but it gets old. (I do not care to advertise in this page any publishers' wares further than necessary to illustrate certain points as they may occur. But the music problem is a serious one financially to many. Why can't some of you start an exchange list. Undoubtedly many of you are tired of playing certain numbers that some one else hasn't got. You might get together with mutual profit.—C. E. S.) "We have the finest theater in the town and as good a picture as shown anywhere; if you came to De Kalb, come in and see the place."

Thanks. I shall be delighted to drop in if I come that way. Now to answer some of your questions. First, I am trying to get some detailed information regarding the book "published in England," and when I do I shall share it with you and the numerous others who have written regarding it. Second, I do not remember "The Sultan's Garden," therefore can give you no practical suggestions. If it calls for music of an Oriental type, there is much in the market suggestive of such. However, judging from the way you handle the other pictures, I don't think you went far wrong in this. Thanks for your good opinion of the "Moving Picture World" and my little page.

Ohio says: "I have little trouble with the pictures, but the comics bother me sometimes. There seems to be nothing in particular to work up sometimes, and I don't like to play rag marches always. Cannot you suggest something?"

Nothing definite unless I have seen and studied the picture. You know yourself that one cannot always remember details (even of a picture he has played) well enough to "lay out" a practical musical synopsis for another's guidance. There are many little musical oddities on the market, such as "Jumping Jack's Jubilee," "Bugville Parade," etc., which can often be used to advantage. Perhaps the answer to "Ohio" might help you.

Minnie E. (Chicago) writes: "We had 'The Clown and His Best Performance,' and I played it as follows: Circus Parade march, Marcelline till end of circus scene, then Circus Parade again until boy alone in room. Then 'I Want to be a Soldier,' while he is playing clown. (Why this? The boy wants to be a clown, not a soldier. Why not repeat your clown music through this scene? C. E. S.) 'Hearts and Flowers' through the sick room scene, then lively when the automobile appears, waltz in the clown's residence till clown appears, then Marcelline till sick room, then Spring song till clown plays on drum, then circus parade again, going back till last scene which I finish with a waltz."

The picture is comparatively fresh in my mind and if you are submitting the above for my opinion, I would say there is much room for improvement. In the first place, you should have played the Clown's music where the boy is playing clown, as that is the dominant idea in that scene. After the sick room is shown, the principal motive is pathetic and you should not depart too far from this. If you used "Marcelline" in the clown's residence, it should have been kept subdued, as the dominant idea is still the illness of the boy.

His father has come to plead with the clown to visit the sick child, and there is nothing lively about the scene. Likewise at the bedside when the clown beats the drum, if "Marcelline" (or any lively music) is used, it should be played very softly so as not to conflict with the general atmosphere of the scene. Otherwise the change from sad to gay would be too marked. I should prefer pathetic all through and let your drummer work the sound effects of the little drum in the sick room. That would be suggestive enough, and even this should be subdued. Keep your pathetic to the close, swelling to forte when they shake the clown's hand, and keeping it up till the finish of picture.

The following suggestions are offered:

Spirit of the Gorge (Edison).—Indian music all through. "Bellstedt's Indian War Dance," "Os-ka-loo-sa-loo," "Sun-dance," and the Indian music from Herbert's "It Happened in Nordland," will be appropriate. The principal thing is to sustain the Indian atmosphere. If you have any heavy, mysterious music it can be introduced to advantage in the second scene, "Worshiping the Spirit of the Gorge," and in the scenes where Kewanee is seen swimming in the gorge until the rescue. Then Indian music till close on the sentimental order if you have it.

Alabama writes: "Why don't you add a department for drummers to your page? Everyone is ready to give the drummer fits; why don't you do something to help him? I have been in the business for about seven years and am classed as good, but I know that I fall down miserably sometimes on the effects. Music don't bother me so much. I use my best judgment, but why don't some one offer some suggestions?"

My principal reason for not adding a drummers' department is the very good one that I am not a drummer. But the idea is good nevertheless, and would no doubt be welcomed by many. As I mentioned in one of my early letters, I would like to make this page a common meeting ground for us all—that does not mean piano players exclusively. If our drummer friends have anything to offer for the good of the cause, their suggestions will be given consideration. But please make your letter brief and to the point. While on the subject I wish to say that the few opinions I have ventured on this matter I owe to the courtesy of Mr. W. E. King, the inventor and the sound effect man of the Orpheum Theater, Chicago. (Mr. King also has charge of the orchestra in this theater.)

I am indebted to Mr. Kipkowsky (Mr. King's violinist) for the following suggestions:

Satan's Rival (Pathe).—First strain of "Pasha's Dream (Bendix) till castle scene. "Cupid's Garden" (Gavotte) till change. Mysterious weird till "Satan disguised as Prince, etc." March from "Aida" till "Good Fairy," etc. First strain of "Imam" (Oriental) till "In Spite of Bertrade," etc. Cleopatra March (by Gruenwald) till "Satan overwhelms," etc. "Vision of Salome" (Lampe) till processional scene. March "Queen of Sheba" till dance of spirits. Second movement "Pasha's Dream" till "The Fairies," etc. Valse lento "Armenonville" (Chas. K. Harris) till "With the help of the Fairy," etc., then bold heroic or polanaise till Hermit is on with Princess and others. Agitato (piano) till Satan disappears in flash. Apotheosis from "Faust" till finish.

Pathe's Review, Aug. 8th.—"Rule Brittania" till statue, then "God Save the King" till change. "Rule Brittania" till statue; "God Save the King" till "Long Branch," etc. March, till "Paris, France" then "Marseilles" till "St. Petersburg, Russia," "Russian National Hymn" till "New York," etc., "Hail Columbia" till "Nice, France," "Le Kic-King" till "Pottsdam, Germany" then "Watch am Rhein," till "Saratoga, New York," etc.; march till finish.

A PROGRESSIVE EXHIBITOR.

In writing to the Kalem Company concerning their releases, S. L. Rothapfel, the manager of the Alhambra, Milwaukee, Wis., says: "We are presenting pictures in this theater in an advanced form, using an orchestra on the stage with special stage settings, a staff of soloists and effects to make the performance as realistic as possible. I am sure if you could see this performance it would do your heart good. It is a very common occurrence for my audience to encore a picture for several minutes.

The letterhead of the Alhambra says: "Milwaukee's foremost theater." This is a very modest claim indeed. Here we are in New York City, which is claimed to be America's foremost city, yet we do not have an all-picture show put on in the style that it is done at the Alhambra. We are living in hope that some day a New York exhibitor will rise to his opportunity, meanwhile we compliment Milwaukee on setting the pace in other things besides the brewing of the amber thirst quencher.

LIZZIE PLAYS FOR THE PICTURES.

By Wilbur D. Nesbit in Chicago Post.

Lizzie plays at the nickelo—
Plays for the moving picture show,
All the time must her fingers go
With an endless whirl and a rhythmic flow
And a ceaseless flitting to and fro;
She fakes and vamps till her hands get cramps
And there is no tune that she does not know;

With a tum-te-tum and an aching thumb
She keeps the time with her chewing gum,
She chews and chaws without a pause,
With a ragtime twist to her busy jaws,
And her fingers fly as the hours go hy;
She pounds the keys with a languid ease
Till the folks go home and the pictures cease;

She never halts, it is march and waltz
While her aching thumb to the bass keys vaults;
And the two-step, too, and the song that's new—
The tinkling tune of the summer moon
And the lazy croon of the loving coon
And the air of the song of the throbbing heart
That will tell of two that the world can't part
And is wholly free of the taint of art;

But Lizzie plays like a grim machine,
And she never thinks what the measures mean,
For she's played them oft and the notes don't waft
Any thought to her that is sweet and soft;
There's a wrangling chime as her fingers climb
Up the yellowed keys as she beats the time,
For the show that costs but half-a-dime.
And she chaws and chews as she seems to muse
On the flying films and the flitting views,

And her hands jump here and her hands jump there,
While hetimes with one she will fix her hair,
But she keeps right on with the other hand
In a ragtime tune that is simply grand
With its rum-ti-tum as her fingers drum.
And a hurst of hass when she whacks her thumb
On the lower keys, and a sudden frown
As she jabs the loud, loud pedal down.

But she wears no smile, for all the while
She chews and chaws in a solemn style—
And at night in sleep all her fingers keep
An unchanging flight as they rise and leap
O'er the counterpane in a wild refrain
Of the tunes she has played with might and main.
And her aching thumb heats a hass tum-tum
While she chaws and chews in her hard-won snooze.
In her dreams her task she still pursues—

Lizzie plays in the nickelo—
Plays for the moving picture show.

IMPERIAL THEATER, JACKSONVILLE, FLA.

The Imperial Theater opened recently in Jacksonville, Fla., to six thousand seven hundred paid admissions for the first day, and capacity houses have continued.

An excellent five-piece orchestra furnishes additional entertainment and the management deserves credit for securing the services of some good vocalists. Baroness Von Zeiber, a soprano of no mean ability, is the feature for this week. The house is under the management of Mr. N. W. Remond.

CHICAGO LETTER.

By Jas. S. McQuade.

An important consolidation of Independent exchanges was made recently that promises great good for Independent exhibitors in the territory affected. The Dixie Film Co., with branch offices in San Antonio, New Orleans and Birmingham, owned by H. Fichtenberg, has been consolidated with the Atlanta Exchange, owned by H. A. Fitzjarrell, and the Texas Film Exchange, of Dallas, Texas, owned by E. T. Peters. The title of the new firm is the Consolidated Film and Supply Co., of Atlanta. The branch offices of the company will be located in Atlanta, New Orleans, Memphis, Dallas and San Antonio, the Birmingham Exchange giving way to the branch in Memphis.

Mr. Fitzjarrell's Baltimore office has been closed for some time and it is the understanding that the Consolidated Film and Supply Company will not encroach on that territory, leaving the northern Independent exchanges to furnish service for Baltimore and Washington. It is also understood that northern exchanges shall not enter territory south of the northern boundary of South Carolina, and that North Carolina for the present shall be open to competition.

The object of the consolidation of the exchanges mentioned is to protect Independent exhibitors from the unnecessary evils of conflicting programs. The great good which has been wrought by the General Film Company for licensed exhibitors in this respect has evidently been recognized by the men who control the Consolidated Film and Supply Company, and their policy and management, in all likelihood, will be similar to that of the General Film Company, so far as the exhibitor is concerned. Indeed, it seems these wide-awake men have taken a step forward that will shortly be imitated by other Independent exchanges throughout the country, as Independent exhibitors will be greatly benefited and better satisfied by being furnished with programs that afford no chance of conflict between nearby competitors.

The Consolidated Film & Supply Company will buy 64 reels weekly for the territory covered by its branch offices. The General Film Company at present purchases 72 reels for the same territory. The company will adhere strictly to the rule that no films will be released until one week after the manufacturers' release date.

It is learned that the picture business generally has been light in the South this summer, the heat being intense. However, it is estimated that about 75 per cent. of the houses, both Licensed and Independent, have been kept open.

I have been informed that Fort Worth is still suffering from the effects of the foolish competition between exhibitors, started about a year ago, when as many as five reels were exhibited for five cents. Both Licensed and Independent managers have been guilty of this horrible extravagance, which has not only brought great financial loss, but the cheapening of picture entertainment as well. Two reels, or three at the very most, are quite enough for five cents. Then the exhibitor has a chance to live.

Messrs. Whittles & Eppstein, of San Antonio, are just finishing a magnificent new theater in that city, built specially for moving pictures, at a cost of $85,000. When these enterprising managers leased a theater in San Antonio with a seating capacity of 1,500 some time ago, and confined their programs to pictures only, they were laughed at by many, and certain failure was predicted for them. For two months they showed to a steady loss; but the tide turned and their profits swelled to as high as $1,000 per week. Now, as an evidence of renewed faith in the drawing powers of moving pictures, they have erected a splendid house for their exhibition.

Another instance of the upward tendency of picture entertainment in Texas is the building of a handsome theater in Houston by H. Fichtenberg. This house when completed will represent an investment of $45,000. It will seat comfortably 850 people.

Educational Pictures in Wisconsin.

J. E. Sherwood, of the Fairplay Theater, Madison, Wis., was seen while in the city last week and informed me that he and his partner, Mr. McWilliams, have again secured a long term lease on the Grand Theater, next door to the Fairplay. Possession was taken August 15, and the house will be opened on September 9 with Licensed service, furnished by the General Film Company's branch, at 117 N. Dearborn Street, this city. The Fairplay will be reopened about the same time.

Mr. Sherwood stated that he has been showing to fine business in the Fuller Opera House all summer. A new house is being built for him and his partner in Fair Oaks, a suburb of Madison, in order to accommodate about 5,000 people in that neighborhood. The house will seat 300 people.

On being questioned concerning the work now carried on by the University of Wisconsin Extension in the interests of educational moving pictures, Mr. Sherwood replied that the last legislature, before adjournment in July, had appropriated $150,000 for University extension work in rural districts. This work includes lectures, the exhibition of educational pictures and a play ground system. The University purchased a projecting machine for use in Madison, and before the public schools closed for the summer, educational pictures had been exhibited in every school in the city. So popular were these exhibitions, the seating capacity was unequal to the attendance. Mr. Sherwood was positive in stating that these exhibitions assisted his attendance materially, as it convinced many people of the importance and value of pictures for information and entertainment.

M. S. Dudgeon, secretary of the State Library Commission, called on Mr. Sherwood a short time ago to make arrangements for "Enoch Arden," the Edison historical series and other films of a similar nature, for use in state libraries. The educational picture has exerted a potent influence among the people of Madison in their attitude toward the city library, and Mr. Dudgeon is now seeking to create a greater desire for reading works of merit among the residents of other cities and towns throughout the state.

Miss Smith, city librarian of Madison, in a recent annual report drew attention to the large increase in the number of books read during the past year, and incidentally attributed the reading of a large number of literary works to the fact that the readers had previously seen films on these subjects.

Mr. Sherwood has always co-operated heartily with city and state representatives in the educational picture movement and is held in high esteem by the residents of Madison.

Swanson Buys Co-operative Exchanges.

William H. Swanson has purchased the Co-operative Exchanges in Denver and Salt Lake for $20,000. The deal was made in order to prevent competition with his Denver exchange.

It has been rumored that Mr. Mullen, who formerly managed the Co-operative in Denver, immediately formed a company, with a capital of $20,000, to open exchanges in Denver and Salt Lake, the reason given for the move being that Swanson had reduced his weekly purchase of films by 14 prints. Rumor has it that Mr. Mullen was backed by Pat Powers, but that the latter withdrew from the enterprise, leaving Swanson undisturbed in the Denver and Salt Lake fields.

Rights for "The Crusaders" Sell Well.

Tom Quill, manager of the World's Best Film Co., is pleased with his success in disposing of state rights for "The Crusaders." E. Mandelbaum has secured the rights for Ohio; the Independent State Features Co. (Hite & Hewitt), for Indiana; the Crusaders Exhibiting Co. (Hull & Stern), for Illinois; J. B. Cavanaugh, of Kansas City, for Missouri, and the Independent Western Film Exchange, for Oregon and Washington. The Miles Bros. will close in a few days for California; Wm. H. Swanson, in all likelihood, for Colorado, and Pennsylvania will be disposed of in a few days to an Independent exchange in that state. The rights for the Philippines have been sold to Frank Goulet, of Manila. The handsome 8-sheet and 16-sheet posters gotten out by Manager Quill for this film are attractive specimens of the lithographer's art.

Chicago Film Brevities.

S. Morton Cohn, formerly of the Amalgamated Film Exchange, of Portland, Oregon, left Chicago for New York by auto three weeks ago. He was accompanied by Mrs. Cohn and they arrived safely Wednesday, August 16. Mr. Cohn reports fine picture business all along the line.

The Texas-Oklahoma Amusement Company, of Dallas, have arranged to show the Kinemacolor Coronation pictures in the opera houses of Texas and Oklahoma at 50 cents and $1 admissions.

Kinemacolor will give way at the Garrick Sunday, Sept. 3, to the regular Shubert attractions.

C. J. Ver Halen, of The Billboard Chicago staff, returned with his wife from their honeymoon trip last week.

S. S. Hutchinson, president of the American Film Manufacturing Co., arrived in New York from Europe on the S.S. Olympic, August 16, after an absence of six weeks.

A. F. Beck, manager of the Central Film Service Co., of Indianapolis, and Mr. Smith, manager of the Toledo Film Exchange, Toledo, Ohio, also J. R. Frueler, manager of the Western Film exchanges in Milwaukee, Kansas City and New York City, were in Chicago the latter part of the week ending August 19. It is rumored that the Toledo Film Exchange will change hands shortly and that either Pat Powers or the attorney of Mr. Smith, the owner, will be the purchaser.

Maurice Fleckles, the genial manager of Laemmle's exchange, this city, celebrated his fortieth birthday on Wednesday, August 16. The office staff presented Mr. Fleckles with a mammoth bouquet of holyhocks and roses, which was proudly exhibited in the front window of the office. Nor did the customers of the exchange forget Maurice, judging from the pile of cigar boxes in evidence on his desk.

Carl Laemmle and family are now at his native birthplace, in Laupheim, Wurtemberg, Germany, as gleaned from a letter received from him at his exchange last week. His stay in Europe is indefinite.

Frank Smith, of Smith & Burton, owners of the Gaiety Theater, Springfield, Ill., visited the Laemmle office last week. They are making preparations to open up on Labor Day.

Frank Vanston, owner of the Temple Theater, Elgin, Ill., called at the Laemmle office last week. Manager Vanston stated that he has kept his house open all summer and has shown to good paying business with the Laemmle service.

V. Metzger, treasurer of the Erie Amusement Company, which owns the Erie Theater at 641 North Clark Street, the Huron Theater, 703 North Clark Street, and the Republic, 3916 Lincoln Avenue, all in this city, was seen last week at the Laemmle exchange. Mr. Metzger reported that the Republic and Erie theaters have shown straight moving picture programs all summer to satisfactory business. The Huron will open September 1st with Laemmle service.

Manager Fleckles, of the Laemmle exchange, and every Chicagoan in the film business, seen last week, speaks in high praise of the comprehensive and satisfactory manner in which the Moving Picture World handled the national convention proceedings at Cleveland. Manager Fleckles states that the business at present transacted by the Laemmle exchange is very satisfactory.

Miss Elaine Davis, a member of the Selig California company, was married to Arthur J. Trussell, of New York, recently. The happy pair passed through this city on Monday, August 14, on their way to New York, where they will reside.

The Playhouse, 1846 West Madison Street, was opened Monday evening, August 14th. The attendance taxed the capacity of the handsome theater. A long line of automobiles occupied the street during the evening.

J. G. Conderman, owner of the Julian Theater, Belmont Avenue, this city, who has played vaudeville until this season, is now showing first-run pictures furnished by the Anti-Trust Film Company. Manager Conderman played to three thousand people Sunday evening, August 13th, with "Mutt and Jeff" as the feature.

The Thirty-first Street Theater, near Cottage Grove, this city, has been taken over by S. A. Bristow, attorney for the William H. Morris, Inc., interests. For the first time in the history of the house, an exclusive moving picture program was run on May 1st. Since then the house has shown to capacity business with first-run service furnished by the Anti-Trust Film Company. Formerly this house used stock companies and vaudeville and always played to a loss. The house never had a winning week until it was decided to run pictures exclusively.

C. R. Plough, manager of the Anti-Trust Film Company, has taken over the White Palace Theater, one of the most beautiful picture houses in this city, with a capacity of 900, and is running high grade pictures. The business has shown handsome profits ever since pictures were introduced. Formerly the house failed to show profits for any week.

Luke H. Mithen, the well known counsel for independent film interests in Chicago, is operating seven picture theaters here and reports that all are doing well. Service is furnished by the Anti-Trust Film Company.

Projection Department

Edited by F. H. RICHARDSON

Follows Our Idea.—For some time past the editor of this department has been calling attention to the fact that with thoroughly fireproof walls, semi-automatic fire shutters over the holes in the operating room wall and an ample vent flue from the operating room ceiling, the fire danger problem would be entirely solved, so far as concerned the audience. It is with pleasure we have just learned that the authorities of New York have realized that the vent flue plan is feasible and sensible and have recommended the passage of such a regulation. That there will be much objection on the part of exhibitors goes without saying, but it is a thing which should be put through nevertheless. The complaint will be voiced that the plan cannot be followel out in a large percentage of the houses, but while this may be true in isolatel cases, it is not true in very many, though it would doubtless to some extent mar the beauty of the house. However, let us ask why it is that in those theaters where such a vent could be installed with the utmost ease it has not been done. In a very large percentage of even the one-story building motion picture houses, where the installation of such a vent would involve merely the cutting of a hole through the roof and installing a properly hooded pipe, nothing of the kind is found. Such a vent, supplemented by proper walls and shutters, would not only eliminate absolutely all fire danger, so far as anything outside the operating room be concerned, but it would also add largely to the comfort of the operator in hot weather. Let me add, however, that this cannot be accomplished by a dinky little six inch pipe. One and one-half square inches of vent flue area to each square foot of floor area, with a minimum of of 150 square inches, and a maximum of about 360 square inches, will serve the purpose. I have said, and I repeat, that with such an operating room one can burn a reel of film, or half a dozen of them for that matter, and the audience absolutely be none the wiser. One trouble has been, however, that operating room walls have been of altogether too flimsy construction. Considering the added factor of durability, stability and safety; brick, hollow tile or concrete walls are not at all prohibitive in the matter of expense. Many an exhibitor has constructed an asbestos "booth" at a cost fully equal to, or even exceeding the cost of really good walls of concrete or brick. We fully realize that there is a certain advantage in having the lighter form of construction in some instances, also that the asbestos room is more readily removable. We do not agree, however, that such makeshifts ought to be allowed to continue. The motion picture business is gradually settling down to a solid, substantial basis and the future construction of motion picture theaters, including their operating rooms, should be of a permanent, lasting character. I have in mind right now one really beautiful house recently erected, here in New York City, at a probable cost of close to $100,000 in which the operating "room" is a little crowded-up affair about six by eight feet, the walls of wire lath and plaster on light metal studding. This joke is hoisted up on stilts, or hung from the ceiling, I forget which, and one must climb into it through a hole in the floor reached by a ladder. This "room" is jammed right up against the roof, but there is absolutely no opening of any sort from it to the open air. Can idiocy go further? There is ample space and the room could just as well have been made twice, or even four times its present size. It contains two machines. We do not by any manner of means wish to harass exhibitors or cause them a penny of needless expense. Far from it. We do, however, want to get them divorced from the idea that any old thing that they can manage to get by the inspectors is good enough for the operating room. We desire, in place of that mistaken idea to bring them to the realization of the fact that the operating room is; after all, the one most important department about a motion picture theater. It is a hard task, but our efforts are not being wasted. Gradually there is tendency to attach greater importance to the operating room, what it contains and the quality of what comes from it.

Double Spot Remedy.—New York City writes: "Further experimenting has shown me that the 'double spot' at the aperture is the result of one condenser lens being out of center with the other. Perhaps you or a brother operator have noticed that when putting the lenses in their mount one will go in quite easily while the other will have to be forced in with considerable pressure. This shows the lens which goes in hard to be higher, thus bringing its center above that of the other one. The result is a double spot."

I grant that the lenses being out of center may cause the double spot effect, but the fact that one goes in hard and another easy is not proof positive that the lenses are out of center. If you have a 7½ and a 6½ lens it is quite possible that the thicker lens will go in harder than the thinner; speaking of mounts of the square, box type. It does not follow that they are necessarily out of center, however. Nevertheless the point is worthy of attention by operators troubled with double spot and we thank you for calling attention to it, New York. Come again! the latch spring is always out for men with ideas.

Sensible Letter.—New York (name of town suppressed) writes: "Have been reading the World for a month and like it very much. What is price of the handbook? Am operating a Standard machine and use D. C., generated by a small single cylinder gasoline engine run by the proprietor of the theater. When everything is running well (not always the case, however) I get forty amperes at sixty volts pressure. Have a rheostat built for 40 amperes at 60 volts, which has half the resistance cut out and it gets just warm, not hot. My picture is 15 ft.; throw 85 ft. When the light is good I have a fine show, but I have to work pretty hard to keep a clear, white picture. When light is thrown on screen with no film in it, it jumps in waves about twice a second. This is not noticeable when film is running, but as voltage drops nearly one-half at each 'wave' it is some task to put up good projection. Often the voltage drops so much that if I separate the carbons more than eighth of an inch I loose the arc. I run two four-reel shows each evening have an assistant to rewind and nice outfit to work with. I start all reels in frame and shut off light before a tail-piece is dragged onto the screen or the white light is flashed on the curtain. I inspect my reels, taking out all mis-frames and bad patches, so that show will run smooth. Have given sixty-four performances since opening, June 27th, and only had film break on me twice. Keep machine perfectly clean and in perfect order. Have flickerless picture, no jump and no side motion with good film. Have had two years in the business, most of it running a machine. Have as good a show, from every standpoint, as I have seen to date, barring fact that light is not what I could wish at times, due to bad current, as before stated. The admission is ten cents and we play to capacity (700) every night, all educated, well-to-do people, which proves that I am delivering the goods. We have the finest house in the Catskill mountains. I receive $15 per week, out of which I pay $8 back to the proprietor for board. They seem to think they are paying me too much. In fact, when I came they told me they would not pay $15 for operating alone and I would have to help with the other work, which I am doing. I think the position is worth $20 at least. What do you think about it? I would like to get with someone with a good outfit this winter, who would be willing to pay for good service. Am a painter by trade, 19 years of age, but have decided to stick to moving pictures if I can make a living at it, but must have $15 or $20 a week. Being under 21 must stay up State awhile yet. What union can I join? To whom can I write concerning same? The seven dollars (and board) I now get does me, but it's too cheap a job for me."

I have given space to this letter for the reason that it comes from a young man who, while he is being taken advantage of, does not resort to abuse, but sets forth his case plainly and sensibly. Here is an exhibitor who, if the letter is correct, is not doing less than seventy dollars a night in business, presumably at a comparatively light rental cost for building. He employs an operator at fifteen dollars a week, assuring him it is too much unless he does other work and then charges him eight dollars a week for board. Evidently, while he thinks operating isn't worth much, board is no cheap thing in his estimation! Probably the proprietor justifies himself with the shop-worn argument that the operator only works a little while in the evening. He is not purchasing manual labor, but skill. I had a doctor at my house a while back. He stayed just five minutes by the watch, but it cost me three dollars, coin of the realm. According to the He-only-works-a-little-while-in-the-evening argument I ought to have paid that M. D. about three cents, and should have made him carry in some coal besides. Then if I could have furnished him with a sandwich and charged five cents for it I would have been ahead of the game. It is not my desire to stir up wage disputes between operators and managers, but such cases as this are altogether too flagrant to pass without notice. This young man writes a good, sensible letter and I would like to see some real manager give him a chance. He is young, but I believe him to be an observing and painstaking mechanic, who will deliver the goods. Will send his address to any one wishing to try him out. If he is putting on a good show under the conditions described he ought to perform wonders with steady "juice." The price of the Handbook is $1.50.

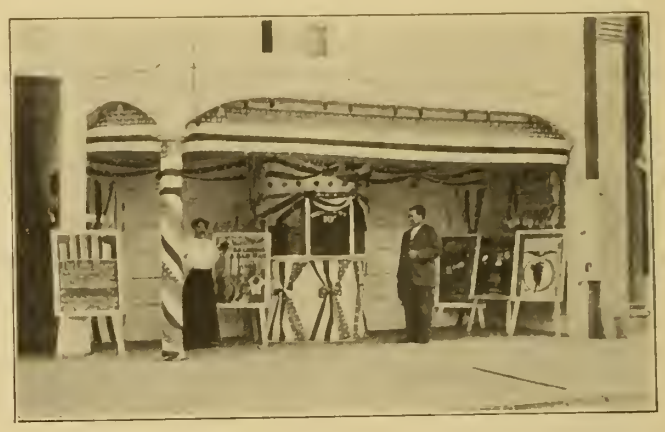
Water Glass Ash.—Burlington, Iowa, writes: "Will you kindly tell me what becomes of the carbons and what the white substance is which gathers on inside walls of lamphouse? Aside from a little dirt in bottom of lamphouse there is nothing left after burning many carbons. Where do they go to anyhow?"

The carbons are votalized; that is to say, they are, by the tremendous heat of the arc, changed into the form of gas, the gas itself being for the most part consumed in the heat of the arc. The white substance to which you refer is the residue of water-glass, which forms the binder for the core of cored carbons. The only portion of the carbon itself remaining is in the form of small pieces broken off from the crater, graphite caps which sometimes form on the lower carbon-tip when using D. C., and fine carbon dust, the latter being carbon which has been released through the binder being consumed before the carbon itself, thus releasing the carbon and letting it fall away.

Gelatine Slides.—St. Louis, Mo., writes: "We recently purchased a set of the Make 'Em Yourself Slides advertised in your paper and they are all right. We use them to advertise next day's programme and things like that and they certainly are a very useful article. Will you please tell us whether the new Romeo and Juliet film, by the Thanhouser Company, is really good or not. We have had several demands for a Romeo and Juliet film from our patrons, but don't want to spring a frost on them. Our operator has considerable trouble with his light at times. He claims it is due to a lowering of the voltage. We take from the street mains and claim this cannot be so. Who is right and how can we test the matter?"

The slides you mention have been reported on favorably by many. For the purpose for which they are intended they are undoubtedly excellent. Yes, the Thanhouser "Romeo and Juliet" is a very excellent piece of work, both from the standpoint of good acting and photography. It is anything but a "frost." As to the voltage, it is possible that the street mains are overloaded at times, thus causing a voltage drop. This is possible, mind you, not probable. If there really is a voltage drop of any amount you should notice a slight dimming of the incandescent globes at the time it takes place. The only really satisfying test, however, is a reliable voltmeter.

Absurd Situation.—Buffalo has a mess on its hands. The new law (p. 457, August 19 issue) uncompromisingly says that all operators of motion picture machines must be licensed. It also says that those not at present licensed must have served a six months' apprenticeship under a licensed operator, utterly regardless of previous experience or anything else. Buffalo has never had a license law, therefore Buffalo operators have never been licensed. It follows that Buffalo men have not served the required six months under a licensed operator. They could not possibly have done so except they went to some other city where operators are licensed. Really it makes one laugh! Such brilliant examples of law-making should be carefully preserved in a museum. Mr. Walker, who stood sponsor for the bill, and whose name it bears, is innocent enough of intentional wrongdoing. He fathered the bill at the urgent request of Wm. Lang, then business agent for L. U. No. 35, I. A. T. S. E., New York City. The New York Operators' Auxiliary indorsed the proposed law enthusiastically, accepting Lang's statement that it was exactly what it purported to be. The real desire for the law was to shut out students fresh from school, compelling them to serve actual apprenticeship before blosoming out as full-fledged operators. The union members had no idea what a monumental fiasco they were endorsing. The editor feels somewhat culpable himself for not procuring a copy of the proposed law and examining it. But in the press of work it was not done by him, nor, it seems, by anyone else. We would suggest that future proposed laws affecting operators, or theaters, in any way be sent to the editor of the Projection Department, who will have them examined carefully and report exactly what their actual purport is. In this way such farcial blunders might be avoided. Buffalo will probably be compelled to waive the apprenticeship clause, so far as its present operators are concerned. But this will be absolutely illegal, nevertheless, the wording of the statute being too plain to be gotten around except by totally ignoring its six months' apprenticeship section. Properly applied the six months' law is excellent in every way.



Cosy Theater—Pendleton, Ore. C. P. Bruce, Manager.

An Omission.—In August 19th issue we intended publishing a picture of the Cosy Theater, in connection with the article "Wild and Wooly West." It was in some manner overlooked at the time. Here it is.

Rectifier.—Ely, Nevada, writes: "I don't suppose you hear very often from a place like this: 1,200 population, away out in the desert 140 miles from the mainline. However, we are constant readers of The World and now trouble you for the first time. We have two machines, one a Pathe professional and one a Powers Six. The power plant in this burg is pretty poor, A. C. 60 cycle and 110 volts—sometimes. Do you know of any transforming device other than the Hewitt Rectifier? I would like to hear from you soon, as the people in our little city are pretty well educated in the matter of good projection. We are running with a General Electric transformer with pretty fair results, still we would like to better our projection."

Yes, Ely, the General Electric puts out a most excellent device, called the "Mercury Arc Rectifier." This rectifier is in quite general use and is giving excellent satisfaction. I don't know how it would work on variable voltage, however. I will send your letter at once to the General Electric Company with the request that they mail you full particulars. You might, in lieu of a rectifier, install a motor-generator set—an A. C. motor pulling a D. C. generator. And now I want to ask you to do me a favor: I don't know whether or not you have them around Ely, but if you do I want you to get me three or four cholla burs (ripe ones) and two or three good clumps of Nail Keg cactus thorns and mail them to me. Don't go to much bother, but if they are easily had I would like them very much.

Choke Coil, Etc.—New York City writes: "(1) Is a choke coil a current saver? (2) Is a Miles Brothers rheostat considered to be a choke coil and is it like an economizer? It has grid plates with insulated wire around them. (3) Is it advisable to hook up two lamps on one rheostat? (4) Would you connect the second lamp from the mains or from the switch of the first one?"

(1) Yes, but a very poor form of current saver. (2) They are a choke coil, but a choke coil bears but slight resemblance, or none at all, to an economizer in electric action. (3) If it is a large rheostat, not working nearly up to its capacity, it is all right. If it is working to its capacity, I would not advise it, since it would then be in use constantly and you would find that under those conditions two rheostats, one on each lamp, would outlast three or maybe four used the other way. I would connect through a double pole, double throw switch. It would be very bad practice to hook up the second lamp from the switch of the first. Both lamps would be charged all the time that way, so long as either was burning. In using one rheostat for both lamps hitch your feed wires to the center poles of a double pole, double throw switch and hook one lamp to each end of the switch, placing your rheostat ahead of the switch.

Excellent Drawings.—Mr. J. J. Jones, Schenectady, N. Y., writes, sending in a large, very excellently executed drawing of various methods of hooking up resistance in series with an arc. While all this has been published in the department before, and much of it is contained in the handbook, still it may be of value to our newer readers. Therefore, and because Schenectady has taken so much pains with the work, I give the drawings space. Mr. Jones also sends circular of what seems to be a most excellent carbon holder of which he is the inventor.

Stocks and Dies.—Baltimore, Md., writes: "What size stocks, dies and taps would you advise me to get for use in the operating room? I have read The World for two years and find it to be a great help."

Well, Baltimore, it would depend on what kind of machine you might be using. Then, too, there are so very many different sizes of screws, with many different pitches of thread, used on mechanisms, lamps, etc., that it would take quite a stock to be of much practical use in repair work. As a matter of fact, I doubt the advisibility of the operator attempting to supply himself with such tools. Most of the taps, etc., are small, very easily broken or lost, and you will find that unless you are to do the repair work on several machines, it will hardly pay you to own them. Will you kindly ask the secretary of the Baltimore union to send me his address at once?

Address Wanted.—Will some of the St. Louis brothers kindly favor me with the initials and address of Brother Fitzgerald of the St. Louis union? I would like to have it at once.

Motor Drive.—McPherson, Kan., writes: "Inclosed find photo of operating room, which is none of the best, but will do very well for the time being. Machine is, as you see, motor-driven. The attachment is so very simple that it is the best method of driving an Edison machine. Am using oil which I believe to be the best that can be had for projection machines. It may be procured at any light plant. It is the Nestor oil and fills the bill to a T. I notice Florida (Aug. 12 issue) has a remedy for my loosing lower loop trouble. I do not find my remedy in his uggestion. Will Florida be a little more explicit? South Bethlehem, Pa., also offers a remedy, but he is wrong, in my opinion. The idler ought not to ride on the film, but should be set the thickness of a film away from the sprocket. By putting a stiffer spring in the idler would be made to ride the film heavily, causing undue wear and strain. He is, however, right about the bracket being short. I note that Salem, N. J., offers remedy for film-jump, viz.: "Drill one small hole in door and put in screw to hold it off the intermittent sprocket (p. 371, Aug. 12 issue). If Mr. Ray will examine the gate he will find, in the upper and lower right hand corners, screws put there for that very purpose."

The driving attachment is simple and effective. Therefore, it is excellent, except for this one thing: By attaching to the lower sprocket shaft you put the driving strain on some gears which would not be called on to carry the load were the drive pulley attached elsewhere, or the belt carried directly by the flywheel. For this reason the flywheel drive has many defenders. As I haven't an Edison head before me just now, and don't remember exactly how the gate is arranged as regards the point in question, I think I will let you and Salem argue that point out between yourselves. South Bethlehem is right about the spring, though he did not put it very plainly. You are correct in saying the idler ought to be set away from the film, not one thickness of the film, but approximately two, but this is accomplished by adjustment screws or otherwise, and what So. B. undoubtedly meant was that the bracket spring should be stiff enough to hold the idler firmly in position. He is right. Weak bracket springs are prolific sources of loop losing; also the idler riding the film causes the same trouble, as well as undue wear on the film, as you say. However, your letter is one which has pleased me much. It is exactly the sort we want for the department. It puts things in a way that stirs up discussion and gives voice to different opinions. Discussion—good natured, of course—is what is needed and what we want in the department.

Chili Shows.—Memphis, Tenn., writes: Can you give me information as to the motion picture business in Chili, S. A.? Are there any exchanges down there, or any shows, and who manufactures the film? If you have not the data, to whom can I apply for information?"

I have spoken to the Motion Picture Distributing and Sales Company and they have promised to get data. Write to them direct. Later—Have learned that Pathe Freres have just received consular report on Chili M. P. business. Write them also, No. 41 W. 25th St., New York City.

The Bureau of Manufactures issues a daily publication; U. S. Consular Reports, which is sent free to any citizen of the United States. It contains reports in the form of letters from U. S. Consuls all over the world. The better plan, if you could wait, would be to address the U. S. Consul direct through the Bureau of Manufactures, Dept. of Commerce and Labor, Washington, D. C.

No Resistance.—Norfolk, Va., writes: "I noticed recently a letter from Colorado in the department in which the claim was made that its writer was operating a projection arc without resistance, other than that of the arc itself, in the circuit. I noticed the sketch accompanying the article did not show the connections of his machine. I noted, also, that you doubt the practicability of such a thing. Ordinarily this would seem to be the fact if one did not dig into the matter a little deeper. Now if there is any one thing I enjoy it is a friendly argument where the layman or operator at large is involved, and when the information is of benefit to operators in general, such as, for instance, the information found every week in the Projection Department. With this prelude I wish to say that our Western brother is absolutely correct in every particular. I also am using a compensarc or, as they are generally known to the fraternity, a 'booster or balancing set.' Colorado does not show how it is done, however, and you seem to, as I before said, doubt that it can be done; a very natural inference at first glance. Let us look at the matter a little deeper, however. Here is a sketch of the way I have my set connected up.

You will note that I use a 230-volt motor, instead of a 115-volt machine, this for economy sake since there is greater efficiency in the higher wound motor, especially when it is running close to capacity all the time. Of course a 115-volt motor would do the same work. If you study the sketch a moment I am sure you will see how it is possible to run a projection arc without a rheostat. For your own information will say that I can get anywhere from 10 to 75 amperes, but am operating our machine with 33, that amount giving all necessary brilliancy with the specially prepared curtain I use. The throw is 97 feet 7 inches. The picture is about 13 feet across. I believe it would be a good idea for operators in general to attempt the solution of the problems submitted to you from time to time before you answer. That might have a tendency to wake some of them up and get them interested, since there is more to learn at the light end than about the motion picture mechanism itself. Close inspection of the drawing will convince you that it would be impossible to burn out the armature of the generator, since a dead short would merely have tendency to strengthen the field of the motor through the compounding. In fact, I have done this very thing as a test; also have placed a three-ampere fuse across the generator terminals and could not blow it. I think if you will put this letter, or the gist of it, in the department without the drawing, which could be publshed later on, it would do a world of good in teaching operators who have a booster set to get busy and find out the whys and wherefores of things. Especially our friend who sent in the sketch from Colorado. While he knows he can burn an arc without resistance, I don't believe he exactly understands the ins and outs of the why and whrefore. I have never met you personally, but happen to know you are an E E like myself, and hope to have the pleasure of a meeting some day. I assure you there is nothing in the least personal in my argument with you, but we can all learn something new every day. I am using a Powers six and must say they are fine machines. I made what I believe to be one improvement, however. I took off the rear roller on the takeup sprocket since my operator complained of losing his lower loop. This roller had a tendency to cause the film to bunch up when it jumped."

Well, Norfolk, I have given practically your entire letter space for the reason that it is all excellent. You need have no fear of taking issue with the editor. Like yourself, I am a firm believer in the efficacy and value of friendly argument. I have studied your sketch and find it to be O. K. I have published it for the reason that there are comparatively few operators sufficiently well versed in electrics to tackle such a proposition with any degree of success. I agree with you, however, that if it were practical to have operators work out many of the problems presented it would be of distinct value. Usually, however, the party propounding them is on the anxious bench for his answer. I have been thinking, for a long time, of inaugurating a contest by propounding one hundred questions, three each week, with prizes aggregating a good sum for the best solutions. I have not yet put the matter through simply on account of the tremendous amount of labor involved. It would do a world of good, however. But to come back to the subject in hand: If Colorado has his arc hitched up as you describe, that is one thing; but my understanding was that he claimed to run on open circuit without resistance—I use the term "open circuit" in this case as meaning lamp hitched directly to dynamo. Going, as you say, a little deeper into things, even this may be done provided a generator is used of the type designated as "constant current." Such a dynamo has a weak field and strong armature reactance, which automatically supplies a constant amperage by forcing down the voltage when the amperage seeks to rise and vice versa. What I said, or at least what I meant, was that the hitching of a projection arc directly to an ordinary generator, with no regulation of amperage save the resistance of the arc itself, is an impossibility. You are wrong in one thing, viz.: in supposing me to be an E E. I am not, but merely a man who has acquired a pretty fair fund of electrical lore by hard study and practical experience. What I consider an Electrical Engineer is a man who can sit down and work out plans and designs. If I want a generator to give 100 amperes at 110 volts, running 1,500 revolutions to the minute, I would call the man who could sit down with tables and pencil and paper and lay out that machine an E E. This I could not do. The term E E as used here in New York City is something of a joke. Personally I know of three different men who have tacked E E on their writings in various motion picture publications who have no right to the title. They are pretty fair electricians, one of them a very good one, but E E—nothing doing. I do not care to make claims which I cannot substantiate; therefore must disclaim the E E end of it, though I thank you for paying me the compliment of supposing me to be one. I shall indeed be pleased to meet you whenever you are in Gotham. Meanwhile let us hear from you often.

Another One.—Mr. S. F. Wallace, chief electrician for Wallace's Golden Rule Wagon Shows, writes from Red Oak, Iowa: "I notice Leadville, Col., is using a motor-generator set connected directly to his lamp without any resistance at all. I am working on a small wagon show, carrying our own light plant. We make small places, 500 population and under. Our show consists of trained animals, dogs and ponies and motion pictures. When I say 'pictures' I mean that we show them right. Only once in a great while do we find projection equal, in our own estimation at least, to our own. We have a 25-ampere, 110-volt Fairbanks & Morse D C generator hooked to a 4-horsepower National gasoline engine. We pull about 35 sixteen candle power incandescent lamps up to the time the show starts, then I pull the voltage down to 60 and throw on the arc (no resistance), and when the picture machine is not running, a spotlight, as all the acts work under a spot with no incandescent lamps burning. The arc pulls the engine pretty heavily. We tried to do it with 110, using a rheostat, but light was not a bit better and engine worked much harder. That is why I think the rheostat just wastes power. The generator runs about four hours each evening and it just barely warms up. Not enough to hardly notice. Am running a Motiograph No. 1 and use the same films all the time, mostly travel subjects and comedy. We get 15 and 25 cents and are sure getting the crowds all right. Our expense is not heavy and what we get is ours. Two gallons of gasoline will run a show so the light bill isn't much. I have taken great interest in the Projection Department and have gotten many useful ideas therefrom."

You will note, friend Wallace, this no resistance proposition is dealt with in my answer to Norfolk, Va., in another place. You say you "pull your voltage down to 60" before striking the arc. Kindly tell us exactly how you do this. Your generator is only 3½ horsepower, I note, still that is ample for 25 amperes at arc voltage, without resistance. It is probably one of the type of machine mentioned in my reply to Norfolk. It is possible Leadville also has such a generator, though he did not say so. You are quite right in supposing the rheostat represents waste, still, with an ordinary dynamo it is necessary for reasons I have several times explained in detail in the department. I have long believed such a show as yours would pay, if rightly managed. In fact, I firmly believe such a show can do exceedingly well with nothing but motion pictures, provided always that they are put on with first class projection and all that implies. A forty or sixty horsepower auto truck—one of the large, roomy ones, such as a moving van, equipped with a governor engine, with governor detachable for moving, and a 50-ampere dynamo, is my idea of an outfit. Such a show should own about thirty reels, or more, of very carefully selected films. The admission should be 15, 25 and 50 cents for a show lasting from 8.30 to 11 p. m., and it should only make small places where there is no electric light. It should be advertised quite heavily, on the same plan as circus advertising is done.

Operators' International Union?—From all over the country letters are being received complaining of the treatment accorded operators by the I. A. T. S. E. Many ask if something cannot be done and what. Others, evidently thinking men, ask why an Operators' International Union cannot be formed. One man, president of one of the best operators' unions in the country, writes at length and I wish I might publish his letter in full. I quote from it: "I note your comments on the recent I. A. T. S. E. convention and am very glad indeed to see that you are getting posted on the inside of this thing. The more you get in the inside the worse you will find it to be—in conventions the operators have always got the worst of it—for the reason that they are dominated by an overpowering majority who are pursuing the old dog-in-a-manger policy of fifteen years ago. Now to the juice of all this: the operator has not, till now, been, as a rule, a man of force or ability. Now, however, with the grand awakening, to which you yourself have so largely contributed, we are bound to get into our ranks progressive, forceful, resourceful men who can, by united effort, do almost anything they may desire, and if the I. A. T. S. E. cannot be compelled to do as they have been told by Gompers, viz.: organize the operators and protect them, then some other means must and will be found to accomplish that end. I hope you will always continue to be the wheel horse for us you have been in the past in general and also get into the work from the union end."

This brother has pounded several nails very straight on the head. There is truth and sound sense in what he says as to the situation. The I. A. T. S. E. unquestionably has not done its duty by the operator, taken as a whole. If that organization wakes up, and wakes up real quick, to the fact that the operator no longer proposes to accept any and everything ladeled out; if it shows immediate evidence of giving the operator a square deal, well and good. If not, then we prophesy that it will hear something drop with a dull thud before very long. The operator of three years ago is not the operator of to-day and he is not only awakening to the real importance of his profession in the affairs of men, but also to a realization of the fact that there are between 15,000 and 20,000 of him in this country alone and that he can paddle his own canoe quite well, thank you, if he is obliged to. It is indeed unfortunate that the I. A. T. S. E. has adopted and pursued such a short-sighted policy. We are not writing this from any desire to mix up in the scrap, which cannot be much further postponed, but purely out of justice to the operators whom we feel and know to have been treated with rank injustice. As to the editor "getting into the union work," it is utterly impossible. He has done, and will do everything, in a general way, possible to further the interest of the operator. There are, however, plenty of younger men with time and ambition who are abundantly able to fight the operators' battles from the union point of view.

"For He's a Jolly Good Fellow" (Essanay), August 18.—Probably this film will give an idea of how some men act toward their families. Fortunately it illustrates an exception rather than a rule. This man forgets his wife's birthday, goes out with some friends when he promised her to come back and the baby dies, presumably because he was so bad. At least, he takes it so since he asks forgiveness for his misdeeds and promises to stay home with his wife in the future.

"The Blacksmith's Love" (Selig), August 17.—In this film the story of Enoch Arden is told over again with a variation upon the original theme which may or may not add interest, according to the views of the individual. Two men go to war. One is apparently killed on the battle field and the other is wounded. The wounded man returns home and ultimately weds the supposed widow. The man left for dead is revived and as his mind is a blank, is sent to a sanitarium. In two years he is cured, has his memory and returns to find that his former friend has married the supposed widow and that they have a child. Unlike the original Enoch Arden this one does not leave them in blissful ignorance of his presence. He makes himself known and the shock of the recognition is a dramatic scene well acted. The woman, torn with conflicting emotions, allows old-fashioned ideas of honor to prevail, places the baby in its father's arms and goes with her lawful husband.

"The Local Bully" (Melies), August 17.—It is difficult to understand why a story of this character always pleases an audience so well, but it does. It tells of a Western bad man who is literally driven out of the settlement by the cool nerve of a stranger. First the terror was knocked down, even as he flourished his revolver. When challenged to a duel with shot guns he dropped his gun and ran. The tenderfoot was a hero. When he opened his sample case his sales were enormous. Clearly he understood the gentle art of advertising.

"Two Fools and Their Follies" (Melies), August 17.—A farce presenting the experiences of a husband and wife. When she went to the city he indulged his fancy for booze. She indulged hers for absurd dress and returned with a harem skirt. When she discovered the booze there was trouble and things were lively in the vicinity of the pair for a time, but when the excitement had cooled down they both swore "never again," while the boys looked on and witnessed the solemn objuration.

"Man to Man" (Vitagraph), August 16.—In this film we are given a glimpse of that innate sense of honor which sometimes controls even desparadoes. A sheriff captures his man. On the way to jail they have to ford a river into which the criminal falls. He is manacled and helpless and in danger of drowning. The sheriff releases him and his life is saved. Indians attack them and the two fight side by side, vanguishing the savages. The time arrives when only one bullet is left, and that is in the desparado's gun. The sheriff is at his mercy. He can kill him and escape, but recognizing that the sheriff saved him from drowning he gives over the precious pistol and goes peaceably to prison. This is no mawkish and sentimental sheriff. He doesn't allow the criminal to escape, but he probably believes when he leaves him in the jail that the man, desperate though he may be and a menace to the society with which he comes in contact, has still some elements of what constitutes a man and that he deserves something better than imprisonment.

"The Inventor" (Gaumont), August 15.—This film is one of those melodramatic impossibilities which most audiences seem to like. A poor inventor is about to sell his invention for a low figure, when his wife and children find a rich man's purse and return it to the owner. He becomes interested in the family and buys the invention for a large sum and gives the inventor a position at a good salary. The story is well told and but for its improbability would deserve greater credit. The test of interest doesn't fail, however. The audience shows plainly what it thinks of the picture.

"The Leopard" (Pathe).—A very tame but lively leopard takes part in this picture, which is of the usual rough and tumble description. One part of the picture most certainly has life. There's a tame monkey and when the leopard sees this he gets after it in earnest and the monkey gets out of the way without formality.

"Chrysanthemums" (Pathe).—This is chrysanthemum time and this film is very seasonable. It makes a pretense of giving instruction in the care of chrysanthemums and does accomplish something along this line. As a picture of these glorious flowers, the film is a beauty.

"Saved from the Snow" (Selig), August 21.—Very beautiful pictures of a great pine forest, choked with deep snow drifts, seem the most attractive feature of this film. The story is simple and is made clear. The players carry through their parts intelligently, but rather theatrically. The picture of the wife wandering through the forest is not effective. It hardly could be made so, for the camera has no means of showing us how big the woods are, nor how dreadful it is to be alone in them.

"The Trapper's Fatal Shot" (Pathe), August 16.—In this picture, among three or four lovely scenes, there is an extremely pathetic one. The trapper and his little daughter have been kind to an Indian who, in gratitude, has promised them his friendship. Later, the braves of this man's tribe kidnap the girl. The trappers find the log cabin in flames and the girl gone and are trailing the Indians toward their country. Meanwhile the friendly Indian, at some risk, has carried the girl out of the camp and is leading her homeward. They have come to a very beautiful glen (the photograph is fine), and while they are standing by a cascade, the trappers arrive in sight. One raises his gun and mortally wounds the Indian. The picture has slight blemishes. The trappers could hardly have been a hundred steps away when the Indians capture the girl. They have fired the house before the trappers could have got half as far away from it as they seem to be when, returning with a load of skins, they find it in flames. What is more, an Indian had fired his gun which they could hardly have helped hearing. It is well acted. The little player who takes the child's part was conscious of the camera, but does very well otherwise.

"Special Messenger" (Kalem), August 16.—The Kalem war-time pictures are pre-eminent. There seems to be no other producer that can make films of this kind as interesting, as realistic and as natural. The "Special Messenger" is as good perhaps as other Kalem pictures that we have seen. It is not an emotional picture, but surely it is a thrilling one. The messenger is cornered on a long bridge and dives off, horse and all, and swims to the bank further down. After he has taken refuge and is hiding, badly wounded, in his own home, his wife takes the important papers to General Stewart. It took a woman's wit to get them through the Federal lines. Perhaps not one in the audience will suspect where she has hidden these papers till she brings them out. The Federals didn't suspect that they were matted in the horse's mane. The last scene, the Confederate camp at night, is a beauty, but the appearance of the heroine and the hero, his face bloody with wounds, before the curtain, as it were, at the end did not add much to the picture. If all the players in the picture carried through their parts with as little camera consciousness as its heroine, Gene Gauntier, the picture would have been perfect. As it is, it is no easy matter to point out any fault. It is a good picture.

"The Modern Dianas" (Edison).—In this interesting picture is shown the adventures of six society girls who go to the wilds of a Canadian island and camp, far away from society and men and other bothersome things. The six boys are lonesome, but there seems no means of redress. Ultimately they work out a scheme by which they land upon the island dressed as Indians and proceed to besiege the girls' camp until they are ready to parley. The council begins and soon the real fact is disclosed. The girls might have been angry, but provisions had run short and the boys had provided themselves with all sorts of acceptable eatables. So the truce became peace and the dianas returned to civilization.

"A Pal's Oath" (Essanay).—In this Western story there is an oath sworn by one man to kill his traitorous friend who proved false after a sacrifice sufficient to have insured him a friendship as lasting as life itself. The time comes when he can fulfill his vow. He creeps cautiously up to the window. He draws his revolver and is ready to fire, but just then the man takes his little one from the cradle and unconsciously covers himself with the child's body. The murderer is undone and leaves without performing his mission. The family continues in its happiness, never knowing how near the father was to death.

"The Working Girl's Success" (Lubin).—A working girl wins the love of the son of the manufacturer in whose factory she works. The young man is turned away by his family and is forced to secure a position on a street car. Years later his family invite him to come back and there is a happy re-union.

"Proclaiming Archbishop Prendergast" (Lubin).—An excellent topical picture adequately illustrating this religious ceremony. There are very many religious dignitaries in the procession, all of whom are well shown. As a reproduction of an important event in religious circles it is one of the most interesting pictures of recent times.

"The Son of the Shunammite" (Gaumont), August 19.—The biblical story of Elisha's raising the little son of the Shunammite woman, who had been hospitable to him, from the dead is given in this picture. The child had gone out, you will remember, to the fields and was sunstruck. This picture is very well tinted and gracefully acted; but it seems theatrical and not very effective. The producer appears to have arranged his scenes almost wholly with an eye to pictorial effect, as though after Doré, and, as pictures, they are very good; but it is like putting the picture, so far as its human action is concerned, into a straight-jacket. The cast was well chosen with only one exception, the prophet. This part was played almost sentimentally, whereas, as all know, the great Hebrew prophets were men of fire. There could have been no wrestling with God in this prophet as shown, one feels, and there could have been no raising from the dead. The player's wig made his head look abnormal and soft.

"Moss Covered Ruins on the Isle of Wight" (Eclipse), August 16.—These scenes of the Isle of Wight, near England, are very well photographed and interesting.

"For the Honor of His Name" (Eclipse), August 16.—This picture of business life deals with an incident that might have been distantly suggested by Ibsen's "A Doll's House." The banker's son has married without his father's consent and has been cast off. The young wife is sick and the young man out of work and to save his wife's life he forges his father's name to secure a loan. The story is very well laid out and dramatic. It is well acted, also, and convincing for the most part. It's a commendable picture.

"The Ranchman's Son" (Essanay), August 12.—To this reviewer, the weak part of this picture seems to be that the circumstantial evidence that the man who lay dead had been murdered at all was so light that it excites a feeling of resentment at the verdict, which does not adequately increase our sympathy for the hero. This seems to be because the hero isn't really known to us; he hasn't been made our friend. In fact, the scenario writer, though he has shown the hero in prison, which the producer made to look like a cavern, has deliberately turned his back on him and made Webster, the hero's friend, the chief point of interest. It is not a picture of the ranchman's son's experience, but of the friend's. As a picture it doesn't seem to this reviewer quite as good as the Selig "Range Pals," which it much resembles.

"Home is Best After All" (Lubin), August 14.—It is seldom that a picture is so thoroughly poor that it can not be commended for something. This picture has one or two very commendable things. But the leading players were very poorly cast and the business is, for the most part, nothing else than silly. It attempts to picture the pathetic adventures of Nellie's father and mother, two country people, at their daughter's city home. The actor who played the farmer was as young as his daughter. He had considerable command of facial expression, but he looked and acted no more like a countryman, except in short passages, than did the lady who played his wife or the young fop that that estimable old woman took across and spanked at the dance.

"The Auto Bug" (Lubin).—On the same reel with "Home is Best" the Lubin people have put this picture of a crazy automobile and its lunatic driver. Pictures of insane people are not greatly interesting to any audience. There's a good picture of an automobile's selective gear transmission in the film. That, at least, is interesting. The doctor sees it when he looks into the crazy man's head.

"Through Jealous Eyes" (Lubin), August 17.—This picture is very dramatic and intense. It is so convincingly acted that if there are any improbabilities in the plot, they pass unnoticed so long as the picture is on the screen. The great doctor's office nurse (Miss Lawrence) and the doctor's son (Mr. Johnson) have fallen in love. The doctor jokes with the nurse about it and seems delighted, but for some reason fails to tell his wife, the young man's mother. Without this defect the picture would have been perfect. His wife sees him joking with the nurse and becomes jealous. The aggravation of this jealousy to the point of madness by a train of circumstances, in which is the wounding of the son, is very commendably shown. The backgrounds of the story are particularly beautiful, being the leafy hedgeways of an old town, with also forest scenes, all of which are well photographed and have much pictorial quality.

"Two Officers" (Edison), August 18.—Two officers of a cavalry regiment love the same girl. The officer who is most in love with her and most in despair proposes to the other officer that they cut a pack of cards to see who shall withdraw. Such an incident is not very likely to effect the average spectator powerfully. We may sympathize with a man who gambles away his money, but we are not so likely to feel for a man who will gamble away his chance of winning a girl. The most popular romantic heroes fight their battle in the way the vast majority of American spectators approve of. However, this incident was utilized to lead up to a very charming picture in which the girl, having found her own preference, is making love prettily to a man who in honor can't respond to it, though his heart is nearly breaking. This scene is worth while most certainly. The picture is well acted and acceptable.

"His First Trip" (Edison), August 16.—This picture goes very well with "The Winds of Fate," a recent release of the same company, and also a very good picture. It tells a story of business life and what is better yet, pictures the business relationship of a father with his son whom he is sending out on his first trip as a salesman. The boy makes good and his father is proud of him. There is a breeziness in the way the picture is conducted and a touch of humor in it that make it especially delightful. The acting also is good.

"Satan's Rival" (Pathe), August 18.—For some reason, this very well acted and prettily presented fairy story picture came as a most delightful relief to this reviewer. Satan, looking for mischief, sees two happy lovers, one a knight the other a princess, and takes a fancy to marry the beautiful princess himself. The knight is warned by a fairy and attempts to frustrate Satan by his own strength. He has a very hard time till the good fairy and the holy hermit come to his aid. Then, Satan is overcome and the princess and the knight are happily married. The costumes are gorgeous and fairly tinted; the settings are adequate and well photographed. It's a very pleasing picture.

"The Message of the Arrow" (Pathe), August 19.—If this is a typical picture of Western life, and it is not unlike many others, the average Western sheriff ought to be recalled as a fool, and law is so sternly administered in the West that if a man is killed no matter how bad the man's character is, no matter whether he is killed to keep him from killing a good and useful citizen, the killer has forthwith to go to jail and can hardly escape hanging, for juries are quick to convict in the West. On the other hand, if the man and his sweetheart can only get on horseback and get a good start to the hills, they are safe. The arrow with its call for help was shot by an Indian girl. She had killed a villain who was stabbing a white man she loved. She fears hanging and permits herself to be lowered to a cave from which she can't escape. An Indian girl passing found the arrow and then helped her out. This reviewer thought that she was finding her own arrow, for the two girls looked very much alike in the picture. When she is free she comes to the courthouse where they are trying the hero for killing the villain and tells how the killing happened. The sheriff then walks her off to jail, from which the hero has to rescue her to save her life. They ride away together.

"The Romance of a Dixie Belle" (Kalem), August 11.—Without any elaborate plot this picture is made very acceptable by the beauty of its last scene. This is in the heroine's bedroom into which the Federal captain, whom she loves, but who has married her chum and schoolmate, climbs in his search for a hiding place. Acting as a spy he has been discovered and is being pursued by the Confederates. The girl, seemingly a traitor to her cause, hides him from her friends, but after they are gone makes him give her his papers and she destroys these before she permits him to depart. The picture exists for the sake of this scene which is worked up skilfully by realistic scenes of Southern life before the war. Gene Gautier plays the heroine's part and is the most important figure in the picture, though she is very ably supported by the entire cast. It's a very good picture.

"The Promoter" (Kalem), August 18.—Bertie and his boarding house friends furnish most of the fun in this breezy comedy. In it grim truth is seen peeping over humor's shoulder now and then; for Bertie is fooled by a scamp mining company promoter and made a very effective catspaw of. Widows and country clergymen, deceived by Bertie's honest look, buy the worthless paper. Bertie goes to prison, but not for his crime of swindling. It was because he couldn't pay a dinner bill. He also is shown as winning much money at a poker game. These things may make some people look askance at the picture, which otherwise is commendable.

"The Bell of Justice" (Vitagraph), August 11.—The old Russian story of the Bell of Justice makes a delightful photoplay. The staging and costuming of the picture are in keeping and, acted simply as it is, it is very effective. After the king has dedicated the bell and is standing near with his lords, an old woman steps out from the people and pulls the rope. The child-like simplicity of this action seems just the touch that is needed to open the story and the same simplicity has been fairly well maintained through the whole film. The Vitagraph Company has a number of strongly contrasted characters and their presence in the picture adds much to its charm. It makes a very commendable film.

"Birds of a Feather" (Vitagraph), August 12.—Although the idea behind this photoplay has been used twice recently (in Rex, "Securing Evidence," and in the Selig, "Jealous George"), in neither instance has the leading man been so competent to put it over convincingly as in this picture. It is made very delightful. The man pictured is just the kind of charming ass that would get himself tangled up in this situation. He begins by refusing his pretty wife the money for a new dress and then buys an expensive one at a department store and has it sent home. His wife sells it to a second-hand dealer and another girl buys it. Then the man sees the dress and following creates a scene in a restaurant. What makes this picture unusually acceptable, is the acting of the leading man and the presence of the other Vitagraph players, as well as the fact that there are no weak spots in the picture at all. It is strong all the way through.

"The Vitagraph Monthly Magazine" (Vitagraph), August 18.—The news value of any piece of information depends on the practical importance it has to the person who receives it. The Vitagraph Monthly gives a very good picture of President Taft (of great importance to every American) reviewing the Brooklyn Sunday-school parade. This annual parade has been known and talked of all over the country by people interested in Sunday-schools ever since Henry Ward Beecher's time, so it too is widely interesting. The monthly also pictures many athletic games. These are very interesting to the few people who were directly or indirectly identified with them; they are fairly interesting to everyone as showing human beings engaged in pleasant sports in which many are interested. It also shows a picture of two locomotives colliding. This is a stirring picture and one that will greatly interest everybody. On the whole, the Vitagraph Magazine is a very acceptable contribution to the month.

Scene from "In the Shadow of the Pines"—Selig Release for August 28.

"Summer Babies" (Essanay), August 22.—The purpose of this film is to educate mothers in the care of babies during hot months. No continued narrative is attempted; it merely pictures what the corps of visiting nurses is doing to give the young children of the very ignorant a chance to grow up into healthy men and women. It is a very commendable educational film.

"Gossipy Yapville" (Essanay), August 22.—To this reviewer it seems a very flat and foolish piece of work, this farce. The characters haven't enough truth in makeup or acting to be good caricatures. The audience didn't laugh or smile so far as we could note. One man left the auditorium; but perhaps he had to catch a train or something.

"Life On the Border" (Selig), August 22.—Plainly no expense of care or money was spared to make this picture realistic and interesting and consequently it is a truly thrilling picture of an Indian raid. It was not a premeditated raid. A cinnamon, silver tip bear led a band of Indians who, finding the cabin deserted (the pioneer was away in the forest and his wife and child hidden), burned it. The pioneer comes back just in time to have his wife, whom the child had, for mischief, locked in the wood shed. The scare of the Indian boys when the bear is first seen, is an amusing incident. There is good comedy in the scene showing the Indians sampling the home-made cordials and medicines of the pioneer's wife. The closing scene showing the arrival of neighbors who had seen the smoke rising and their gathering before the now ruined cabin home, with the pioneer and his wife and child happily reunited, is very emotional. It is a very commendable film.

Independent

"A Traitor to His Country" (Great Northern), August 26. The characters in this picture seem to be Austrian or Servian on the one hand and Turkish on the other. The story is a melodrama, brilliantly acted and laid out with skill; it is also effectively photographed. It's a love story. The traitor, an officer of high rank, sells his country's secrets for money and, as usual, contrives to have the hero condemned to death as the culprit. But the real traitor is noticed slipping away in the darkness and followed. He is caught in the act and after a very brisk engagement with fists and swords he and some of the enemy are captured. The hero is saved as the firing squad is taking aim. The picture has a true military atmosphere—pictures of military life in foreign lands, where nearly every able-bodied man has to serve his term, usually have—it is brisk and exciting. It is among the three best independent pictures of the week.

"Black Cloud's Debt" (Powers), August 22.—An Indian love story is pictured, on this film, with beautiful forest scenes of trees and ferns, but it is hardly convincing. One red man saves the life of another of the same or at least a friendly tribe. But the rescuer is a coward and the rescued has several chances of helping him to cover this failing. Both love the same girl. The cowardice of the man is detected and he is condemned to spend one moon (not a month, but a night) in the "wolf pit," though probably no North American tribe had such a thing. Black Cloud feels himself still in debt and drawing his knife lets himself down into the wolf pit in the coward's place. The wolves are the tiny grey wolves about as big as fox terriers and mangy from summer captivity, and this whole scene, whose setting is at some zoo, is quite laughably ridiculous. As a result of this very brave deed, Black Cloud wins the girl.

"The Crisis" (Thanhouser), August 22.—Under "Film Stories," volume 9, page 479, of the Moving Picture World, this picture is described as entitled "The Cross." The picture is made up of a succession of dramatic incidents logically connected into a single story of a sea captain and his mate. The first scene opens at once a strong situation leading to a wreck which is suggested to the spectators with astonishing effectiveness; as a result of this wreck the drunken captain goes to jail on the testimony of his mate, and after he is released he is stayed in an attempt to kill this mate by a parish priest, who leads him to the cross. It is a fault in many photoplays that they demand our acceptance of incidents, which may be natural but which are not convincing merely because time and space were not taken to make us familiar with the mental peculiarities that make the events natural. The picture of the captain's conversion fails to be powerfully convincing for just that reason. One point in the picture was obscure. We are shown the priest as leaving the mate and the captain together and on his way home being moved to return to the mate's house. We see him start back; but, for a moment, this reviewer thought that the house the priest seems to be leaving was another view of the mate's house, whereas it was his own house. The priest comes back in time to catch the captain's hand as he is about to stab the sleeping mate. He then is seen leading the fascinated captain out of the house and is holding the cross before his eyes. The background is plainly American, as are the captain and even the priest. Sailors of Brittany might be fascinated so, but would Americans, even when they are sailors?

"The Romance of Lonely Island" (Thanhouser), August 28.—The early scenes of this picture, with the darkey maid dusting in the author's library, have little truth; they are like vaudevilles. The author is interrupted so much that he runs away to Lonely Island, a secluded spot that he owns, and there he hopes to finish the book he is writing. Again he is interrupted and finds himself playing the hero's part in a, for him, very realistic love story. The picture's charm lies in its pretty scenes. The story is not drawn realistically, nor is it very far removed, save by its pleasing acting, from the commonplace.

"Alias Yellowstone Joe" (Nestor), August 23.—The reviewer takes much pleasure in commending this breezy and prettily romantic Western story, for the artistic way in which it is conducted and acted, for its photography and the skillfull choosing and handling of backgrounds and scenes, but especially for the restraint shown in developing the heroine's part in the picture. Miss Violet Mercereau takes the part of the sheriff's daughter, who gives Yellowstone Joe a drink of water, not because he's a bandit, but because he's a human being in trouble. When this bandit, later, has artfully escaped and joined his band, the sheriff's daughter, through a convincing train of happenings, falls into their hands. Joe renders her a very great service and is within an ace—that's almost literal—of being killed for it. He is saved from his own men by the sheriff's attack and the sheriff's daughter gives him her horse and revolver to escape. This will be commended by young people anyway. There's no kissing, no sloppy sentimentality and no passion. The producer has guarded the sheriff's daughter from doing anything that would lessen our admiration for her. Of course, in the fight between the posse and the fleeing bandits there's a good deal of shooting with much smoke and every shot a miss; but everybody in the picture keeps stepping lively and in the excitement this isn't noticed. One especially well planned scene is where the last two bandits are cornered and driven into the pool where they hope to hide in the rushes and scdge. The pursuers are too close upon them and they surrender. They come out stepping lively—it is just the kind of walk that was needed to give the proper illusion. Again, as a closing scene, in a beautiful perspective, well photographed, we see in the distance the posse with the two captured bandits. They plainly are wasting no time and there is something in it that makes us realize that there will be no monkey shines with that sheriff. There is no brutality and the men are plainly not going to be lynched. The scene shows a thoroughly American, business-like sheriff.

Western pictures are not the highest form of art; but pictures like this are valuable, even necessary to people living sedentary lives or lives lacking in healthy excitement out of doors. It's a refreshing, good picture.

"The Victory of Love" (Great Northern), August 19.—In this story a girl, even though she has a lover, consents to marry a man in order to release her father from a serious financial obligation. But the lover does not consent and his grief when he discovers the real situation is sufficient to make her father resume his resolution and get out of his difficulties as a man should.

"Grandfather" (Reliance), Aug. 19.—Here is a picture which will attract for two reasons, first, it is well acted, the story having some element of novelty in that the childishness of an old man is used as the basis of the plot. There are some exceptionally good scenes in which the leading actors, Henry Walthall and Mace Greenleaf, as the rival lovers, do creditable work. The father favors one, but the girl the other, and the plot turns upon the fact that the one the girl loves becomes insanely jealous because the other gives her a little attention and is in turn accused of stealing a sum of money which the old man has secreted. The sheriff is called and it looks dark for the unfortunate lover. But the old man has a touch of returning memory aroused by the tumult about him, goes to the hiding place and takes the money out. The crooked ways are all made straight and the lovers are happy with father's consent.

"An Indian Love Story" (Bison), Aug. 18.—Here is a variation of the eternal triangle by making it a quadrangle. There are two Indian couples, all of whom are dissatisfied with their partners and want to change. After considerable fighting and the near execution of one at the stake there is a re-adjustment in which the misunderstandings are forgotten and each woman goes away with her former lover. No white people appear in this contest.

"The Squaw's Devotion" (Powers), Aug. 19.—There are a number of exciting incidents in this film. Perhaps quite the most so is the contest between the trapper and the two Indians when he vanquishes them both in the water. It is the story of an Indian girl whose gratitude to a hunter gets him into trouble with her lover. He captures the trapper and only by her intervention does the man escape through the burning brush. A shot intended for the trapper hits the girl, which turns him into a demon and the canoe chase and water fight follows. The trapper then brings the girl ashore to regain her health and strength.

"As a Boy Dreams" (Imp), Aug. 24.—This picture has something of the same spirit, though it is not so poetic as "Peter Pan." The picture of the dream that came to the boy who was very fond of reading of pirates is given very much as a boy dreams. The pirate story's interest is small except as a dream and the picture of the boy and his father might have been drawn more typically. The picture is acceptable.

"The Battle of the Wills" (Imp).—A very Mephistopholes-like villain is pictured on this film as attempting to come between two lovers. He uses hypnotism and seems to have subduced the girl's will so that she has the appearance of loving the dark-mustached, mysterious stranger. It seems that his cunning plans will prevail for, when the hero leaves the girl to make preparations for the wedding, the villain appears and the girl is about to go away with him when the hero comes back. Now ensues the battle of the wills between the two men. The girl between them seems drawn one way and then the other as the hero's or the villain's mind gains a momentary advantage, but at length the hero is victor. Such a situation is not only humanly impossible, quite; but it instills erroneous ideas regarding the human will and hypnotism, which are not healthy. This delving into the morbid for picture subjects is not wholly commendable.

"Love in a Tepee" (Imp), August 21.—There was some laughter as this reel was projected; it was mostly at old Bad Eye, the Indian with a heavy jag. The situation which rises out of Bad Eye's determination to have Hyacinth, his daughter, marry a Mexican when she wants to marry a cowboy is not very interesting. Bad eye in a drunken sleep under a blanket is picked up by the Mexican and carried off in his arms under the supposition that he is carrying little Hyacinth. It is not very funny nor is the Mexican's discovery of Bad Eye a very amusing situation.

"Castles in the Air" (Rex), August 24.—These castles are Bedelia's, who is a strapping cook and has been drinking more than was wise. She dreams that she has an immense fortune and that the family are her servants and she being courted by a noble lord with a most ridiculous crown on his head. The picture is of course farcial, but now and then it is amusing. When we see the great heiress fallen into the river we feel that the dream is drawing to a close. The next scene lands squarely in reality. Bedelia is again in the kitchen and being spattered with water from a broken pipe.

"Bill Follows the Doctor's Orders" (Lux), August 25.—This rough and tumble picture didn't impress this reviewer as being either novel, except one scene, nor funny.

"The Power of Devotion" (Yankee), August 28.—A madman is the hero of this sensational picture. We see him going mad from overwork; we see him when he is mad, which isn't pleasant, and we see him cured by a fall.

"Retaliation" (Yankee), August 25.—The older brother spurns a woman and later she retaliates by making the younger brother, a dramatist, fall in love with her and then makes him suffer. It may safely be described as a barnstorming melodrama.

"A Great Wrong Righted" (Yankee) September 1.—A complicated plot doesn't keep this very well photographed picture of sailors, afloat and ashore, from being clear, but it is not at all powerful nor even convincing. The characters are not well chosen. The hero as "made up" is no sailor, never could be, nor is his well-to-do father a seaman. The son is drunken, but has decided to reform. He catches a burglar in his father's house and is knocked on the head so that his memory leaves him, and when he comes to he no longer knows who he is, and wanders off. His hat, found near the empty safe, makes his father and wife think that he has stolen the money and fled. The hero in his wanderings gets another blow and recovers, and the ending is happy.

"The Candle of Life" (Ambrosio), August 16.—This film is fascinating, yet there is a sense of the wierd and unreal about it which makes the onlooker glad when it has passed. A woman, disappointed in love, retires to a convent. Before the altar of the Virgin she sees in a candle flame a series of visions which tell her of her life. With the last flicker of the candle the woman dies and her spirit is seen to leave the body. Some will question whether a subject of this character is advisable, yet probably it illustrates nothing that most people do not believe, in one form or another. The photography is excellent.

"The Dread of Microbes" (Ambrosio) August 16.—This poor man is a prey to the fear of microbes and the things he does to escape their direful ravages furnish a few minutes of good sport.

"A Sioux Spy" (Bison) August 15.—Another picture in which no white man appears. It is the story of an Indian war. A Sioux spy is sent out to learn the strength of a Cheyenne tribe. He feigns illness and is taken into the village. Immediately he falls in love with the chief's daughter. Then begins a conflict in his soul which is well expressed in his acting. Another spy is sent and learns the reason for his dilatory tactics. The Sioux swoop down upon the Cheyennes and the spy refuses to fight against his own people. When the father of his sweetheart is in danger, however, he goes into the contest and the Sioux are defeated. His reward is a bride.

"Pioner Days" (Bison), Aug. 25.—The average spectator will never accept this as a picture of life. The locality where the pioneer settled was a thin second-growth woods. After he had built his cabin, he and his wife were shot wantonly by white renegades. This will not be understood nor believed; this reviewer doesn't believe it. The man's son comes running back and finds his mother dead at her doorstep and his father unconscious beside her and, with his father's gun (he can hardly carry it) wanders away. He acts poorly. The father, though wounded in the head, now stands up and shows surprising strength as he goes off to become a tramp. There seem to be many people living in the neighborhood. A good-hearted miner has a bunk ready for the boy who comes to him and whom he adopts. The father also gets assistance. Years later, when the miner and the boy have "struck it rich," the father finds him.

"Cowboy's Loyalty" (Bison), Aug. 22.—The picture's opening scene is a Western gambling dive. The writer of the scenario of this picture knows real life. It is a picture that gives meat, blood-red for strong men; real, passionate and for the most part convincing. From jealousy the girl whom the hero loves shoots the gambler and then because the man is willing to take the blame, she falls in love with him. The girl who witnessed the deed remained in the picture too long; she wasn't needed more than a moment. The bars of the man's prison broke too easily; afterward he and the girl were "married in haste." Why was it desirable to put that on the screen in such a story as this? The sheriff's refusal to serve the warrant was melodramatic and foolish and the man's tearing up the warrant was natural, but meant nothing. It is no picture for little children.

"The Blotted Brand" (American).—Here is a Western ranch story with a determined girl as the principal figure. A couple want to marry, but her father will not consent until the young man's herd is a third as large as his own. The brands are very similar. Shortly the elder gentleman begins to miss cattle and they suspect the young man of rustling them. He is accused, but denies the accusation and offers to help run down the culprit. When they follow the rustler they discover it to be the girl. The father, impressed with her determination, gives his consent to the wedding and the blotting of the brand ceases.

"Edelweiss" (Eclair), Aug. 21.—Famous French players set forth the characters in this picture of an Alpine story. The chief characters are a guide and two families of travelers. In one family there is a young man and in the other a girl and these are lovers, but the girl is crazy to go up into the hills to get some edelweiss flowers. Her parents won't hear of her going and the young man is afraid of the heights. A guide sells him a bunch of edelweiss, but because he has been paid with a bad coin he exposes the sale and the girl is disgusted. The girl herself then goes up the hills with the guide and the timid lover becomes brave, follows and gathers edelweiss for her on his way. The picture is well acted, but is conducted so as to be funny; the consequence is that we don't feel very much sympathy with the heroine, who seems silly, and the picture fails to affect us powerfully.

"The Godfather" (Reliance), August 26.—This picture seems not very well photographed, but is wisely conducted and very well acted. The plot of the story is complicated, but is made clear. Two men, both of whom are fond of gambling, love the same woman. The unsuccessful one remains the friend of the young husband and wife and is the godfather of their child, a son. The husband ruins himself at play and dies and the boy grows up. He, too, gambles away his money and runs away to the West. Unknown to either, he and his godfather play cards and the youth cheats, is discovered, attempts to kill the godfather and is about to be hanged when the godfather recognizes him. They go back to the East together and meet the mother. The weakness in the story lies in the fact that there is no character which compellingly attracts us. These characters won't appeal strongly to the average spectator.

BRONCHO BILL'S LAST SPREE (Essanay).

Motion picture theaters are now very well acquainted with "Snakeville" and some of it's residents, to wit: "Mustang Pete" and "Alkali Ike." "Broncho Bill," who has for some time, and for some reason, been kept out of the limelight, again takes the center of the stage in Snakeville's affairs in the Essanay comedy, "Broncho Bill's Last Spree." Broncho Billy has become almost a nickname for G. M. Anderson, who plays the part. Mr. Anderson seldom essays to play comedy, but when he does, and in the character of the roystering, never-you-care, "Broncho Bill" he is more than acceptable.

At the top of the hill a lone figure appeared one beautiful Sunday morning in "Snakeville." He gazed down at the sleepy village and then, without warning, let out a savage war-whoop, and started down the hill, wildly waving a brace of revolvers. It was Broncho Bill.

saddles. Broncho soon left his pursuers behind. Taking a short cut, he pulled up at his cabin, turned the horse loose and went inside. He was tired and almost sober. He decided to go to bed. He was soundly sleeping when the sheriff and the cowboys broke into the room and clipped handcuffs on him.

In the meantime, Ezra Boneacre, still grumbling at his luck, was surprised to see an elderly lady from the East, carrying a bag, cross the street from the depot. "Ez" was the only one in sight and she asked if he knew William Jones. "Ez" had never heard the name before and shook his head. The old lady brought out a faded photograph and asked "Ez" if he had ever seen this man, her son. She was Broncho's mother.

He explained to her that Broncho lived only a short distance and that he would accompany her there. They arrived just a moment after the sheriff and "Ez," asked the Scenes from "Broncho Bill's Last Spree" (Essanay).

A few moments later the mad Mullah staggered into the saloon and with a volley of oaths and lead soon cleared the establishment. Turning to the bar he picked up the nearest whiskey bottle, drained it dry and looking to his gun let out another whoop and started out into the street. Down another block he found old Ezra Boneacre, a ranchman, watering his horse. Ezra was very deaf and had not heard the shots and was not apprised of Broncho's whereabouts until the puncher was on him, had ripped off his boot and was endeavoring to shoot it full of holes by tossing it in the air. Boneacre did not stop to argue, but limped off on one foot at the best speed he could negotiate.

An Englishman, who had just come from his room, was Broncho's next victim. He was forced to dance to the tune of rattling bullets at his toes and only until Broncho exhausted his ammunition did he find it possible to escape. Inside the hotel the guests were already fleeing to cover when Broncho entered, smashing away at everything in sight. "Alkali" Ike, asleep upstairs, suddenly flounced out of bed, when a leaden pellet, fired at random below, scratched his thigh. In the church peace and good will suddenly was turned into pandemonium when the rioter burst in and broke up the meeting. In the meantime the various victims of Broncho's disorderly conduct had fled to the sheriff's office.

Broncho had returned to the Red Eye when he looked back and saw the sheriff and his victims coming up the street. Quickly he leaped into the saddle on the nearest horse and dashed out of town before the sheriff and his quickly organized posse of cowboys could get into their old lady to wait outside, with the intention of being certain of the surprise. Calling the sheriff to one side he explained the unfortunate situation.

Sheriff Dixon had a mother,too. Exacting a promise from Broncho to keep straight and play fair he slipped off the handcuffs, and pinned the star on Broncho's bosom. Next he slipped the handcuffs on his own wrist and gave Broncho the free end.

The old lady entered and it was explained that her son, Sheriff Jones, had just captured a desperate character. After embracing the dazed Broncho she turned to the "culprit." Her eyes were filled with tender motherly concern as she poured out advice. "Don't drink," she cautioned him. "Be a good man like my son." "Look at him," she said, proudly, "through his soberness and his energy he has become sheriff of this county. I brought a bible for him, but seein' he's kept good I think I will give it to you. Read it." But the sheriff couldn't stand it any longer and pocketing the bible with a mumbled promise to do so he started out, half dragging the stunned Broncho after him.

At the sheriff's office this official unlocked the handcuffs, slammed them on the table and glared at Broncho. "You are a case, Bill, he mumbled, "you sure are a bad pickle. How long is she going to stay?" "A week," replied Bill. The sheriff hesitated, then slapping his knee he arose, protesting as Broncho started to take off the star. "Keep it on. You'll have to be sheriff of this county for the next seven days. I'll have to keep out of sight, I suppose, so I'll take a little fishing trip up in the hills. See that you maintain law and order in this town while I'm gone."

He turned to the door, then felt in his pocket and pulled out the bible that Broncho's mother gave him.

"And see here, you drunken galoot," he said, as he paused on the threshold, "you had better read this bible your dear old mother gave to me!"

And Broncho did.

"THE THUMB PRINT."

Vitagraph Players, Assisted by Captain Faurot, Successfully Portray the New Criminal Catching Method.

The identification of criminals by the "thumb print" method was first brought to public notice by the dramatization of Mark Twain's story "Puddenhead Wilson." The play was of the same title and the title role was taken by that delightful comedian, Frank Mayo, since deceased. As the despised country lawyer, "Puddenhead" fastens the crime upon the real perpetrator by means of the "thumb print" theory, which was his fad, thus saving the suspect who would have been convicted by circumstantial evidence.

Scene from "The Thumb Print" (Vitagraph).

Recently the "thumb print" method has been duly recognized in the New York criminal courts and has been the means of bringing wrong doers to justice. The expert in these cases is Captain Joseph Francis Faurot, of the New York Police Department, and wide publicity has been given to his achievements with this novel but effective method of detecting criminals.

A clever adaptation of the "thumb print" theory is now brought out by the Vitagraph Company in the forthcoming picture "The Thumb Print," in which the crime of murder, circumstantially ascribed to the wife of the victim, is clearly proved to be the deed of quite another person . The dominant character in the story is a postmaster in a small town who attempts to win a wife and a fortune by hook or crook. By destroying letters from an accepted lover the postmaster convinces the woman that the lover is unfaithful and wins her consent to marriage. By fraudulent means he takes the little fortune of a trusting Italian and, with wife and money, departs for the big city, where he hopes to be safe from the memories and consequences of his rascality.

There the unexpected happens; the woman meets her supposed unfaithful lover and learns of her husband's perfidy. There, also, he is discovered by the Italian who has been defrauded and who finally gains his revenge by stabbing the villain with a pair of shears belonging to the wife.

The wife is arrested and is tried for the crime upon circumstantial evidence and is likely to be convicted when the "thumb print" expert comes into the case and demonstrates the error of the presumption and frees the woman. It is in this scene that Captain Faurot takes part, making the actual contrast of the thumb mark of the woman and of the Italian who left the tell-tale print upon the shears with which the murder was committed.

Strong situations and stirring scenes mark the progress of the story to its climax and the happy finale is accomplished when the accused woman is acquitted and leaves the court room upon the arm of her faithful lover.

"THE CRUSADERS" MAKING BIG HIT.

Julius Singer wires the Moving Picture World from Kansas City, Mo., under date of August 21, as follows: "The Crusaders shattered completely all records here Sunday for attendance at the Twelfth Street Theater, thus demonstrating what can be accomplished with a theater with large seating capacity and a moving picture of merit, backed up by a very liberal expenditure of money in judicious advertising with large newspaper display, pictorial posters, heralds, etc. Street in front of theater packed and jammed from early morning till late in the evening with people clamoring for admission, necessitating the use of four policemen to maintain order. We are, this Monday morning, still counting the receipts. Photo taken of crowd in front of house; will send you one. The Crusaders booked for two more weeks at Twelfth Street Theater, with six more to follow at other theaters of this city."

REX DISCOVERS EUROPE.

We can hardly tell how it happened, but somehow we overlooked the importance of the newly-established Rex branch office in London. Merely establishing a foreign branch is not in itself a notable event, so the World in its last issue gave it only a young bit of space. But just as Rex is not like other film manufacturers, so the Rex London office is not like other branch offices. It is the first of twelve foreign branch offices, and absorb it from us, this is going several. Since then we learn of the opening of the Vienna and Copenhagen offices, and the Berlin and Paris headquarters are scheduled for an early inception.

Rex has crossed the ocean, not like the adventurers of old, seeking new worlds to conquer. It has been invited to invade Europe and vanquish it. Ever hear of anything like it? Actually inviting a conquerer to come and take possession. The answer is, of course, that possession means a boon to the picture-going European public. Exhibitors, pressmen and showmen of wide and thorough film experience, pronounce Rex the king of all American film, and possibly it is only pride in their own product that prevents them from admittedly conceding it the acme of all the brands American or European, on both markets.

Rex has afforded London an encore of the coronation. Rex was crowned! JOE ENGEL.

"BY THE HOUSE THAT JACK BUILT" (Imp).

Subject of Cover Illustration.

Nearly all the mythical beings mentioned in the Nursery Rhymes of Mother Goose appear in the Imp release of Monday, September 11, in a film with the above title. It is a fairy story that will at once be familiar to children in all English speaking countries and will be witnessed with interest by their elders. It is a pretty little drama with a beautiful story of the adventure of a bond girl, who is transported to the land of the fairies by The Old Lady of Bambury Cross on her fabled White Horse. There she meets all the characters mentioned by Mother Goose at the House That Jack Built, including Old King Cole and his son; Little Bo Peep, Taffy, the Welchman, the Priest All Shaven and Shorn, Little Boy Blue, Simple Simon and many other of the mythical beings, supping with the fabled king at which time the Four and Twenty Blackbirds are released from the pie and begin to sing. The bond girl eventually marries the prince after some attendant difficulties which cause the banishment of Taffy and the Wicked Queen. The cast is a large one, the costumes elaborate and the ensembles large. It is one of the most interesting fairy stories ever attempted.

STOLE FILM.

Gordon Chollar, a discharged employee of Will Carleton's motion picture show, Berryville, Ark., was arrested at Eureka Springs, Monday morning, August 14, on a charge of stealing a reel of film from the show. He admitted his guilt when arrested and is now in jail awaiting trial next week. His offense is grand larceny and may give him about two years in the penitentiary.

ESSANAY RELEASES FOUR REELS PER WEEK.

Fourth Reel On Thursday.

The Essanay Film Manufacturing Company, of Chicago, have announced that beginning the week of September 4th, they will issue a fourth reel, the new release day being Thursday. Regarding the variety and nature of the various releases, it is said that no special date will be made for comedy, drama and Western, but that the Essanay program will be sufficiently varied to suit all exhibitors. Below is given the list of releases for the first four-reel week of the Essanay Company:

Tuesday, September 5th, melodrama, "The Diamond Gang"; Thursday, September 7th, comedy, "The Dark Romance of a Tobacco Can," and "Never Believe in Signs"; Friday, September 8th, comedy-drama, "The Wrong Glove"; Saturday, September 9th, Western comedy, "Broncho Bill's Last Spree." The last named subject is another of the Essanay Company's Snakeville series and is a special feature. Another of the Snakeville comedies is ready for release, under the title of "Town Hall To-night."

NOT FREE POSTERS.

New Rochelle, N. Y., August 19, 1911

Editor Moving Picture World, New York City,

Dear Sir: We printed up last week a quantity of circulars for the use of exhibitors in billing "Romeo and Juliet," and your paper was kind enough to inform its readers in the issue of the 26th that this matter was to be had gratis. This is correct, but the item stated that the matter was posters. This is incorrect, as the matter referred to consisted of circulars and not posters. This circular material will be sent exhibitors free of charge as long as the supply lasts.

Very truly yours,
THANHOUSER COMPANY.

HALLBERG'S NEW CATALOGUE.

We are advised by Mr. J. H. Hallberg, "The Economizer Man," that his new 100-page motion picture catalogue is now in the printer's hands. The conditions under which this will be distributed to the trade will be announced in Mr. Hallberg's regular advertising space in the World very shortly. Watch for the announcement as this work will be valuable not only as a catalogue, but as a reference book for operators and managers, containing, as it does, many hundred illustrations, tables, data, etc.

MONOPOL CO. CONTROLS DANTE.

The Monopol Film Company, of New York, has acquired from B. E. Clements, et al., the Helios production of Dante's Inferno, together with all rights and title. They also hold the dramatic copyright. This acquisition puts the Monopol Company in full control of all the dramatic rights of Dante's Inferno in America.

It is their intention to sell state rights for both productions. The Milano film, which is in five reels, and the Helios film, in two reels, will be leased on separate arrangement.

STOLEN REELS.

The Empire Film Company, 150 East Fourteenth Street, New York City, ask us to state that a liberal reward will be paid for information that will lead to the recovery of four reels lost or stolen from one of their delivery wagons:

"Indian Love" (Bison).
"Gasoline Elopement" (Imp).
"Visit of a Friend," "New Kind of Arm Chair" (Itala).
"The Picnic," "A Foot Romance" (Powers).

CAPTIVATING ORCHESTRA EFFECTS.

Progressive exhibitors are ever on the lookout for orchestral effects that will enhance the picture and at the same time give the charm of novelty or originality to the show. This is provided in a very effective manner by a set of chimes that have just been placed upon the market by the Leedy Manufacturing Company, 1063 East Palmer Street, Indianapolis, Ind. These chimes are designed primarily for the moving picture exhibitor. They are made from special metal tubing and the scale has a compass of one and a half octaves, chromatic, from C to F. The natural notes are nickel plated and the sharps or flats copper plated, for the convenience of the musician. The Leedy chimes are mounted on a rack 59 inches high by 41 wide, said rack being of a takedown model, which can be set up or taken down in a few minutes. There is hardly a picture shown in which the impressive music of the chimes cannot be used with good effect, but the careful drummer or pianist will be careful not to overwork them and so maintain the novelty of the effeect. The price of $60 for the complete set, with rack, seems reasonable indeed, as they are carefully tuned and have sufficient volume of sound to fill any auditorium. Traveling exhibitors can be supplied with a fibre case, in which the whole outfit can be transported or checked as baggage, at an additional cost of $15.

GREAT CHAMPION PICTURE COMING.

Manager Dintenfass, of the Champion Film Company, announces the production of an exceptionally meritorious subject under the title "The Red Devils." This is one of Sidney Drew's plays produced originally as "The Red Men" and presented throughout the English speaking world by Mr. Drew's own company. The Champion has purchased the right to adapt this play to pictures, and it will be produced under the personal direction of Mr. Drew. A large company of performers has been engaged for the purpose and a sensational picture will be the result. Special music has been arranged for "The Red Devils." The release date is September 13.

VITAGRAPH—Jimmie's Job (Comedy).....1000

WEST—MAKER OF PICTURE HISTORY.

Whatever may be the future of the moving picture business in Australia and New Zealand, the credit for the pioneering work in this class of amusement will always belong to West's, Ltd., whose influence have spread far and wide over southern lands. The well-known motto "While I live I'll grow" can be fittingly applied to the enterprises of this firm than any other similar venture anywhere, for theaters and branch theaters and touring companies are carrying the name of West into every city and town where there is room for legitimate amusement. The future geographer will soon demonstrate the importance of a settlement by a bare recital of the fact that West's, Ltd., have established themselves in a given town he indicates. Early in the year H. E. O. Gee, the managing director, made a tour of the centers at which his firm are doing business, and was immediately seized with the importance of making further provision for patrons Two additional establishments were opened at Perth, another at Fremantle, whilst it was found necessary to arrange for additional premises in another part of Adelaide. Premises have had to be extended in Melbourne, whilst in Sydney, despite the fact that the firm already runs the Glaciarium, the Palace and the New Princess Theater, the biggest theater south of the line—Olympia, Paddington—is nearing completion. A gigantic studio is in course of construction on the roof of the company's great office block in Pitt Street, and generally speaking, "Wests are making things prove."

YERKES EFFECTS FOR DANTE FILM.

Mr. Thomas Gaffy, the sound effect expert, of the Yerkes Manufacturing Company, has been operating the sound effects for the exhibition of the Dante's Inferno picture, at the Auditorium Theater, Baltimore, having been engaged by Mr. Mozart, of the Monopol Film Co., to instruct sound effect men for their various companies. Judging from the way the audience applauded his efforts, is proof positive that sound effects are a most essential part of the picture and wide-a-wake managers will be quick to realize their importance. The Yerkes Manufacturing Company are constantly working out new sound imitations and the Yerkes Building, at 202 E. 88th St., New York, is a busy spot these days.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

EDITOR WRIGHT OBJECTS.

Bellefontaine, O., Aug. 9.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—Some time ago I embarked in the book publishing business and gained a very flattering sale for a booklet intended for Scenario writers. I have since then sold the business and retired from the game. When I prepared the work, I took the unusual liberty of dedicating it to a certain editor and author as a humble medium of appreciation for many kinduesses he unselfishly extended to me when I was new to authorship. He had absolutely no knowledge of the contents nor of the appearance of the booklet until he received a presentation copy. I am reliably informed that stories are being persistently circulated to the effect that the gentleman in question was cognizant of the complimentary personal mention and all other material the booklet was to contain, and that he was financially interested in the venture. The reports are malicious falsehoods. They not only do an injustice to the editor before mentioned, but also seek to steal from the undersigned what credit may be due him for a careful compilation of his experiences. I have reason to believe that it will not be difficult to trace the origin of these malicious yarns and I have already taken steps to ascertain whether the originator has sufficient financial responsibility so that a suit for libel will prove worth while.

I thank you for permission to use space in your interesting journal.

Very truly,

WILLIAM LORD WRIGHT.

SAYS HE'S A "SORE-HEAD."

Philadelphia, Pa., Aug. 15, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—I am a "sore-head.". I make this declaration on my own initiative, simply because I do not wish our friend. Emmett Campbell Hall, to go to the trouble of calling me one in a later issue.

Why am I a "sore-head?" Well, here is one reason: On the 12th of June I sent a scenario to a much advertised manufacturer of films. I received no acknowledgment of it; this is, of course, O. K. On June 28, I asked for a report on my script. This letter was ignored. On the 22d of July I again wrote for a report. I got the script back on the 27th of July. You will find that 40 days elapsed before I heard anything regarding the script.

When it came back, with it came a short note, which said, "It is good, but unfortunately we can't use it."

That is all right; some don't offer any reasons as to why they are returning scripts. I looked the script over carefully (you know I hadn't seen it for 40 days); on the back in the handwriting of the director (I suppose) was a memorandum. This memorandum had been partly erased, but some of it was still readable.

It read "good story here," but after that the words were pretty well erased. The last two words were what held the eye. They came just before the initials of the man who made the memo.

Those two words were "MAKE COPY." If you can beat that kind of business you have simply got to cheat. I sent that story out again, but I rewrote the last page, which had on its back the memorandum, this page I have in my possession at this time.

How can you expect anything else but these piratical methods? If any film maker will stoop so low as to re-vamp a plot already done by his neighbor (neighbor meaning any one who makes films), how can a scenario writer expect to be given a square deal?

I wonder how long "Scribner's Magazine" would last if a bunch of "hack writers" were hired to re-vamp the last issue of "McClure's" or "Munsey's?" Yet we see week after week, on the screen, pictures that cause the audiences to say, "Oh, Gee! that's the same thing as that one of 'Who's this' we saw last Saturday."

Mr. Emmett Campbell Hall, in a recent article from his facile pen (or rather typewriter), says: "Whether scenario writing does or does not pay depends on the scenario."

Right there I disagree with Mr. Hall; it does not in any way depend on the scenario. It depends in a great measure on the "Digestive Organs" of the Editor who reads the manuscript. If it depended entirely on the scenario, why is it the moving picture public is subjected to the hardship of watching the "unwinding" of a photoplay two years old, made over slightly, and with a new name. I have in mind a scenario which originally was released by a foreign film maker in the "dark ages." This to my knowledge has been re-vamped by three American manufacturers. The last "re-vamp" being released Aug. 4.

What would I not give for the privilege of calling two or three editors and as many directors, by their first name. O Raptures! Just imagine, you "outside writers," what it must mean to walk into a studio and say to the editor: "George, here's a comedy I turned out last night; let's have the money now, will you?" And then go up to the "sacred" director and say: "Joe, I'll let you take me out to lunch to-day." Can you imagine anything more delightful than a "Utopia" like that?

If you want something like that to really happen, "Oh, ye outsiders," get a job re-vamping.

Oh! by-the-way, I almost forgot something. On June 6 I sent a scenario to a well-known firm; on the 26th of June, I received the synopsis of my script. I have made two written attempts to get the rest of it back, but without avail. Why do they retain this part of the script?

I will use this paragraph in which to thank the editor of the Moving Picture World for his liberality in opening his pages to the "outside writers" of photoplays. It is refreshing to find an outlet for opinions and facts like this journal, which is not "subsidized" and has no "censor" among the film makers. I thank you, Mr. Editor, in the name of all the "outside writers" (although I have no power to speak for them), for your liberality and stand in this momentous question of poor pay and poorer treatment of the clan.

Come on, you writers of "returned with regret" scripts; clean up your typewriters, and agitate, and you too, Mr. Exhibitor, remember the "Boston Tea Party." Throw overboard those re-vamped films and demand what you pay good money for.

As I believe my allowance of "printers' ink" must be about off the rollers, I will bring up with a quick stop.

My best wishes to the Moving Picture World and the "outside writers."

Yours very truly,

INTER NOS.

ANOTHER GOOD OPERATOR.

Wilmington, Del., Aug. 19, 1911.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir.—Being an "Old Timer," and having been in every principal city in the country, I feel justified in calling your attention to the most perfect projection I have ever witnessed in my travels.

In pursuance of my business I had occasion to remain here the past week, and visited "The Lyric," on four different days, and saw in all, twelve reels of "Independent" films.

Not once during the entire shows was there the slightest discoloration in the light and it was beautifully handled in every respect. Although the subjects appeared old, I could easily have imagined them painted on the screen.

Upon inquiry, I learned the operator's name to be William Gilbert, and that he is using a "Standard" machine.

I believe such an example as Mr. Gilbert teaches the public, as well as ourselves, that the photoplay is fast ascending to the throne of perfection.

Such careful effort deserves commendation, and I trust you will give this letter space in your valuable publication.

Wishing you the success you so richly deserve, I remain,

Yours truly, ALBERT BROOKFIELD.

BIOGRAPH.

SWORDS AND HEARTS (Aug. 28).—As Hugh Frazier, son of a wealthy tobacco planter, leaves to join his company in the Confederate Army, he becomes engaged to Irene Lamhert, a beautiful, but cold and calculating girl, who promises her hand when he returns victorious. Unknown to Hugh, Jennie Baker, a little girl of the "poor white class," has fallen passionately in love with him. Her father is one of those who hate the "aristocrats," eking an existence selling berries, etc., from their little gardeu. Hugh, making a flying visit to Irene, is only saved from capture by Jennie's devotion, she taking his horse and donning his hat and coat, by which she leads his pursuers astray. That night, Jennie's father is killed leading an attack by Bushwackers upon the Frazier Mansion in an attempt to secure the family wealth, but old Ben, the negro servant, anticipates their designs by taking the family strong box and burying it. The Bushwackers, however, burn the old mansion to the ground, Hugh's father perishing in the ruins. Hence, when Hugh returns, he finds himself homeless. Irene has turned her attentions upon a Union officer, but Jennie is still faithful. Hugh now sees her worth, and old Ben appears with the strong box which has remained hidden since the night of the attack.

THE BARON (Aug. 31).—Two waiters, vain of their personal appearance, have their photographs taken by an itinerant photographer. The boss catches them and "Fired!" is the result. One of them hits upon a scheme to get easy money by posing as a baron. Things are coming his way, when he is met by his erstwhile friend, who gives the snap away. However, he would have succeeded in marrying an heiress, hut for a mixup at the license bureau, giving hiu a dog's license instead of a marriage license.

THE VILLAIN FOILED (Aug. 31).—An unsuccessful suitor gets his rival drunk, so as to win the girl away from him. The intended victim's friends, however, thwart the villain's plans by making it appear that the girl's sweetheart had attempted suicide because of her coldness. This so impresses the girl that she consents to an immediate marriage to the young man hy the minister they have called in.

KALEM.

RORY O'MORE (Sept. 4).—The patriot Rory O'Moore, fleeing from the English soldiers, steals a moment with his sweetheart, Kathleen, who has beeu followed by Black William, the informer. Thus his hiding place is betrayed. Kathleen learns a price has been placed on Rory's head. Hearing an attempt will he made to capture him she warns him, and to gain time intercepts the redcoats. Closely pursued, Rory plunges into the water, with every chance of getting safely away, hut bearing the cali of a drowning soldier who has folowed after him, Rory turns and swims to the man and aids him to gain the shore. The captain of the pursuers is for allowing Rory to go on his way, hut Black William demands his arrest. Rory is imprisoned and later placed on trial. When asked to plead, he makes the well known reply: "If to fight for Ireland be a crime, then I am guilty." The judge places the black cap upon his bead and pronounces the death sentence. The good priest, Father O'Brien, however, has a plan. Marching to the gallows platform with Rory, at an opportune time he cuts the rope that hinds our hero's arms. One well planted hlow lays out the executioner and Rory is over the wall where he finds a horse awaiting him. Reaching the shore he finds his sweetheart aud mother, with a boat ready to take him to the ship in waiting. Bidding farewell to Erin he is off to America.

WHEN TWO HEARTS ARE WON (Sept. 6).—Alcibiades Shamley and Cassandra, a sweet young girl, with a very bad temper, are married. After the wedding Cassandra prepares her pup, Cara, for the wedding journey. The Pullman car porter discovers the dog in the car and Alcy and his bride are promptly put off. She wires her uncle, the vice-president of the road, asking that all the employees of the railway be discharged as Cara has been insulted. Reaching their first stopping placc, Alcy is informed that no dogs are allowed. Cassandra insists she will keep the dog and they start out for another hotel. Alcy finally hribes the clerk of a railroad hotel to permit them to keep the pup. They are hardly safely landed, however, before the pup causes trouble. To cap the climax he makes a meal of the maid's new hat. In the meantime, Alcy has been receiving a series of telegrams from his wife's relatives, all in the same vein. The last one is a dandy: "Take my tip. A six-barred fence isn't in it with Cassandra's temper. Some of her own medicine will cure her.—Uncle David." As Alcy finishes reading this interestiug message, the maid demands pay for the hat the pup has destroyed. This is more than Alcy can stand, and he proceeds to make things lively generally, winding up by accusing the pup of swallowing his collar button. Alcy throws the dog into the soup tureen, and starts on a general rampage. Cassandra picks up her uncle's telegram and sees a light. Stopping her husband in his mad career, she begs him to forgive her and obediently admits she is conquered.

WHEN THE SUN WENT OUT (Sept. 8).—Tom, about to go on a hunting trip, consults his almanac and finds there will be a total eclipse of the sun, visible about 2:45 p. m. On his way he stops to visit his sweetheart, Nell. He has hardly left the cabin when in an attack by Indians, Nell's father is shot and she is made captive. Returning to the cabin about noon, Tom discovers Nell's absence, and noting the signs about realizes her danger. Trailing her to the Indian camp he seeks out the hig chief and says: "Release her or I shall put out the sun." Instead of heeding Tom's request, the chief orders him tied to a stake. Just then the heavens begin to darken until the sun is totally eclipsed. The Indians, believing tbat Tom has made his threat good, release the captives, who quickly make their escape. A few minutes later the sun coming out from under the eclipse, tbe Indians start in pursuit of their fleeing prisoners. Nell's horse soon gives out. A few miles further on Tom's horse drops also. They continue running on foot dodging their pursuers until they cross the trail of a party of new settlers just as tbe Indians are about to reach them. A short and sharp fight takes place, the Indians being finally defeated. Tom tbanking his rescuers declares that friends in need are friends indeed.

VITAGRAPH.

THE PRINCE AND THE PUMPS (Sept. 9).—Asleep in the hammock, with her dainty little "tootsie" hanging over the side, lay pretty Betty Terry, but not so sound asleep she cannot see handsome Dan Ballard crawl underneath the hammock and take her pump from her foot, press it to his lips and hurry away. When he returned to the hammock, finds it vacant and a note from Betty, saying: "Find me out if you care, You can have me if you dare."

He reads the note, takes his glove from his pocket, and leaves it in the hammock.

Betty's maid finds the glove, and brings it to Betty, who tells her mother and her maid all that has happened.

The owner of the hotel gives a masquerade ball for his guests. Dan decides to masquerade as "Prince Charming" and Betty masquerades as "Little Red Riding Hood." Dan, as "Prince Charming," has the slipper, and insists upon trying it upon all the ladies feet, and learns when he tries it on Betty's foot that the pump belongs to her. She evades bim. The next morning, after the reception, Betty's maid is so impressed with the experience of her young mistress, she thinks there may be a possibility or her meeting a "Pince Charming," by taking her place in tbe hammock. She takes a pair of Betty's shoes and places them on a stool near the hammock. Dan sees the maid and mistakes her for his sweetheart, rushes to tbe hammock and folds the anxious maid in his arms. She grabs him around the neck and holds on like grim death. He extricates himself just as Betty comes upon the scene, and greets him with shouts of laughter, accusing him of making love to her maid.

Next day Betty goes horseback riding, comes to a high stone wall is attracted by some blossoms, brings her horse close to the wall, and climbs upon it. The horse walks away and she is unable to get into the saddle again. Dan sees her predicament, and tells her if she will let him try on the slipper again, which he takes from his pocket, he will bring the horse within reach and help her out of her difficulty. After some hesitancy, she accedes. Dan dares to ask her to be his wife. She consents and makes him her "Prince Charming."

JEALOUSY (Sept. 4).—Discarded, like a passing fancy or a momentary toy, the woman, who, a short time before had basked in the favor of her lord and master, stands with jealous rage, hesitating between her burning love for the man and enmity for the woman who has taken her place. High strung and impetuous she cannot bring herself to the level of a cringe to beg for what she believes is rightly hers. It is plain to be seen by the expression of her face and the convulsive twitching of her body that she is aflame with hatred and defiance. These are supplemented by the passion of her soul in the destruction of the armlet, which she tears from her arms as if to obliterate every reminder of the man she once loved. These mementoes seem to be everywhere recalling her to the majestic heights of vindictive rage; then bringing her down to the depths of despair and uncontrollable sorrow.

He beckons to her to bring him wine, she proceeds to obey, when the last straw is placed upon her sensitive nature; she beholds the hand of the unworthy object of her affection, drawn by the hand of his new found love within the draperies.

"The Wine!" It is the wine of death. Trying to shut out the thoughts of it all, she covers her eyes as she passes the glasses with their contents within the portieres. The deed is done! She glances at the lifeless hand, which had but a moment ago received the potion.

Her bejeweled dagger in her hand, and the prayers to Bhudda on her lips, she retires from the room, staggers back again, holding her hand over her dagger-pierced breast, plunging forward she grasps the silent hand of the man in her own, and dies with the calm smile of resignation and happiness.

A FRIENDLY MARRIAGE (Sept. 5).—A struggling prospector strikes a rich lead, and suddenly finds himself a rich man. Lillian, his daughter, is given the full benefit of her father's wealth. She starts East to visit her aunt, who takes her to Europe and introduces her into society. There Lady Somers takes a fancy to her, and is announced in the society columns as a wealthy heiress from the West. Lord Francis's attorney calls his lordship's attention to this notice, and it is agreed if a suitable settlement can be secured from Lillian's income, he might consider a matrimonial alliance with her. The attorney calls on Lady Somers, and a meeting is arranged between Lillian and Lord Francis.

The contracting parties show a friendly disposition towards each other, and decide that they will be married and consider the transaction merely a friendly relationship, she allowing him a certain portion of her income from her father.

Lord Francis possesses ability as a writer, submits a manuscript for a novel to a London publisher. His friendship for his wife ripens into love, and she becomes very much in love with him. While writing his book, he employs, unknown to his wife, a very attractive stenographer, with whom his wife happens to see him conversing, as she is passing the window of his study. Lillian is very much disturbed. When he comes into her room she is ready to find fault with him; be explains the situation to her and hands her a cablegram from her Western home, which contains the news of her father's loss of his entire fortune. She is greatly distressed, but he reassures her of his ability to take care of her by showing her the check from his publishers, and an order for an additional production from his pen. Lillian is the willing recipient of his proffered embrace.

THE WILLOW TREE (Sept. 6).—Tom Rawling, a young farm hand, lives with his mother and his cousin Ruth, to whom he is engaged. Tom cannot get work. He receives an offer to go to the Canadian Northwest. His mother advises him to accept it.

Before going, she asks him if he ever gets a shelter of his own in the new country to plant before the door a willow tree, as they have before their cottage at home, to keep old memories alive. He promises her to do so. He prospers in Canada and is able to buy a small cabin. He plants the willow and writes his mother that he hopes to have her and Ruth soon with him. It is a severe winter. Tom gets caught in a storm, is half frozen and falls down a steep bank, striking head and losing his memory from tbe accident.

A year passes and they receive no letters at home, and know nothing of Tom. Mrs. Rawling is taken ill and dies on her death bed. She gives Ruth some money and bids her to go to the Northwest and seek Tom. Ruth goes, and through seeing the willow growing at the door of Tom's cabin, she finds him. By recalling the associations of the willow tree he finally recovers his memory.

Restored to health, he and Ruth are soon married.

CHERRY BLOSSOMS (Sept. 8).—Billie and Dollie are very much in love with each other, and they declare their love under the cherry trees.

In later years Billie receives news of his appointment as a cadet at West Point: he promises to return to Dollie as soon as he graduates and claim her for his wife.

While at West Point he meets the daughter of the United States Minister to Japan, and becomes very much infatuated with her. The minister's daughter is a confirmed flirt and considers Billie another string to her bow. He calls on Dollie before going to Japan, but they are to be merely friends, he suggests, and shakes hands with her. In Japan he receives an invitation to a garden party, and again meets the minister's daughter. She arranges to meet him in the garden underneath the cherry blossoms in the Japanese garden. She is coming towards him with an armful of cherry blossoms, which bring to his mind his first love. She turns away, to meet her other admirer—to whom she is also engaged. Billie sees her, is conscious of her insincerity, demands from her his class ring, which he gave her when she promised to marry him. She appeals to Billie, but he is done with her, and she haughtily turns toward the house.

Billie is again at home, in cherry time. He goes to the old cherry tree, where he first met Dollie. She has made a custom of visiting the old trysting place in remembrance of the happy days and of the only one whom she has ever loved—there she meets Billie, who asks her to forgive him and take him back to her heart, which she does.

JIMMIE'S JOB (Sept. 9).—Jimmie, a baseball "fan," reads a notice in the newspapers of an interesting game between two of the leading teams, and feels that his presence is necessary to its success. The typewriter employed in the same office is "on to him" and when he is seized with violent cramps, she is not surprised. But not so with the sympathetic boss, who advises him to get home and receive the kind attentions of his mother.

Jimmie goes straight to the baseball grounds, and the boss returns to the office, where he finds a newspaper containing an announcement of the ball game on his desk, placed there by the typewriter. The boss sees the announcement and decides to take in the game himself, much to the satisfaction of the typewriter.

On his way to the ball field, Jimmie's attention is attracted by a thug who is trying to steal a young lady's pocketbook. Dexterously taking his cigarette from his mouth, he places it to the neck of the thief, saves the young woman's purse and gets a vigorous blow from the miscreant. This does not, however, deter the youngster from getting in to see the game. In the midst of his enthusiasm his boss takes a seat and joins in the national game, contributing his encouragement to the local favorites. Jimmie soon attracts the attention of his boss and everybody else. His boss makes a mental note of Jimmie's remedy for the cramps, and the next morning at the office gives him "a call down," in the midst of which the young lady whom he saved from being robbed enters the office. She is the boss's fiancee, and her eulogistic description of Jimmie's bravery as her protector wins the boss's admiration, and instead of a prompt dismissal, Jimmie is rewarded with a five-dollar bill and unstinted praise from his superior.

HER CROWNING GLORY (Sept. 12).—Helen, the daughter of Mr. Bunny, a wealthy widower, is a mischievous child, as well as a spoiled one. She comprises the whole family and makes her father her willing and happy slave.

Mr. Bunny decides to engage a governess for Helen, and her advent is the signal for rebellion on the part of the child, who does not hesitate to show it by slapping and striking the governess, whenever she gets the chance. Mr. Bunny is smitten with the governess, who possesses a luxuriant head of hair and a face that is a shame to speak of. He seems to be fascinated by them, and finally asks her to become his wife. Little Helen observes her father's attentions to the governess. Helen's nurse does not think any more of Mr. Bunny's choice than little Helen. She puts Helen up to clip the radiant locks of the governess sleeping in the chair by the window where she is drying her hair after giving it a shampoo. Helen does the job with neatness and dispatch.

When the governess is awakened by a kiss from Mr. Bunny and discovers the loss of her crowning glory she is a sight, which turns the love of her employer to ridicule. He tells her that she can consider herself dismissed not only from his heart, but from his home. She makes a hasty exodus and the home of Bunny runs on with the same tranquillity as it did before it was disturbed by the lady with the "Godiva" tresses.

EDISON.

THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE (Sept. 1).—We see Jefferson writing the declaration with extracts from the famous document and the next morning the argument and final adoption of it by Congress, while John Adams' son, afterward the sixth President of the United Seates, has stationed himself at the door to listen for the news so that he may notify the old bell ringer in the tower of Independence Hall and enable him to send the news broadcast through the city by the iron tongue of the old liberty bell.

NEW YORK STATE BARGE CANALS (Sept. 2).—In this latest Edison educational offering, interesting from beginning to end, we are impressed by the fact that man appears to have little part in the stupendous work. The massive and complicated machinery seems to act as though it were itself alive and endowed with intelligence. An electrically-operated bridge conveyor, 420 feet long, weighing 600 tons; a dipper-dredge feeding hydraulic disposal boat, cantilever cranes; a movable dam of bridge type (the first of its kind in America); concrete locks in operation, etc., are all shown and each adds its peculiar interest. Huge buckets raise tons of rock and dirt, opening and closing their tremendous jaws, enormous cranes swing, raise and lower, and a chain of curious conveyors on a belt slowly eats its way into the shore.

THE THREE MUSKETEERS (Part I) Sept. 5).—D'Artagan leaves home to seek his fortune. Armed tagnan leaves home to seek his fortune. Armed with his father's sword and a letter to the Captain of the King's Musketeers, he rides forth boldly to face the world.

At a wayside inn he arrives just in time to rescue a young woman from the clutches of several of the Cardinal's spies.

He arrives in Paris shortly after and presents his letter to Captain de Treville of the Musketeers. Here he catches his first glimpse of the famous Three Musketeers, Athos, Porthos and Aramis, and decides to fight his way into the Musketeers. In leaving, he runs into Athos, who berates him for his stupidity. This is more than he can bear, even from a Musketeer, and a duel is arranged for one o'clock at the rear of the convent. Hastily turning from Athos he comes into violent contact with Porthos, tearing his cloak from his shoulder and disclosing his ragged jerkin beneath. D'Artagnan bursts into violent laughter at this unexpected disclosure and is challenged to a duel at two o'clock at the convent grounds.

Upon reaching the street he spies Aramis chatting with two musketeers and decides to join them, when he discovers that Aramis' foot is resting upon a beautiful lace handkerchief. Wishing to ingratiate himself in the good will of Aramis, he calls his attention to the handkerchief. Aramis denies ownership, but D'Artagnan insists that he saw him drop it and, picking it up, hands it to him. D'Artagnan is again soundly berated for his stupidity; the result is another challenge at three o'clock at the convent.

D'Artaguan has lost so much time quarreling that he finds it now time for his first duel. He hurries to the convent only to find all three musketeers waiting. Hardly has he crossed swords with Athos, however, when a company of the Cardinal's guards appear and attempt to take them into custody for dueling. D'Artagnan volunteers to fight on their side and is gladly welcomed. The fight proves a glorious victory for the musketeers, who gather up the swords of their fallen enemies and march triumphantly from the field, arm in arm with D'Artagnan, their sworn friend.

They are all brought before the king, but when he hears of the odds against them he not only rewards them, but promises to make D'Artagnan a Musketeer.

THE THREE MUSKETEERS—PART TWO (Sept. 6).—D'Artaguan having discovered that the girl he has rescued on his way to Paris is none other than the Queen's confidante. Constance, loses little time in becoming better acquainted.

The Queen has a secret love affair with the Duke of Buckingham and as a token of her love, she gives him a set of twelve diamond studs. Richelieu's spy, Milady, discovers this and at once reports it to the Cardinal. He sends Milady to steal the studs and persuades the King to give a state hall and ask the Queen to wear the diamond studs, which he does.

As soon as she hears this request she writes a note to Buckingham, but finds she has no messenger whom she can trust. Here Constance comes to her aid.

The Queen gives her the note and also her handkerchief as a token and she leaves to find D'Artaguan. He is not far away, so she tells him his mission, gives him the note and handkerchief and bids him God-speed. Richelieu's spy has overheard their plans and hurries to report the matter to the Cardinal. He sends the spy out on the road ahead of D'Artagnan with instructions to prevent his reaching Buckingham.

D'Artagnan in the meantime has confided to his comrades that he is on a dangerous mission and all three decide to accompany him.

The spy manages to leave D'Artagnan's three friends disabled, but our hero arrives safely at Calais, where he finds the port has been closed.

Buckingham's boat is about to lift anchor. He forces the Captain of the port to have him rowed out to the ship, where he meets Buckingbam and finds that Milady is also on board. Milady manages to cut off two of the diamond studs and hurrying out of the cabin jumps into D'Artagnan's boat and is rowed ashore. Realizing that Milady has taken them they hastily call for a boat to go ashore, but Milady has taken the last one, so there is no way but to swim. Taking two valuable studs from Buckingham to replace the stolen ones, D'Artagnan leaps through the port and swims ashore.

He wins the race to Paris, arriving in time to have the two studs set and delivers the twelve intact to the Queen, who generously rewards him by giving him a valuable ring and also his heart's desire, Constance.

AT JONES' FERRY (Sept. 8).—Jones' Ferry was an ingenious sort of an affair and one that kept Jones' family in funds for years until the son, John, grew to manhood, and learned the lumberman's trade; while Nellie stayed at home and took care of the house. With the exception of Dick, a friend of her brother's and son of Big Morton (foreman of the lumber camp) none won her favor; while John was in love with winsome Dolly, Morton's daughter.

One day Big Morton lost his temper and struck John in the face.

Hot words passed between the two and that started the feud between the Jones and the Mortons.

Old man Jones kept his hatred buried in his heart, just biding his time when he would get back at Big Morton.

Old Jones' day came at last. An accident happened to Dolly Morton, who slipped and fell from the logs in the river. In a moment she was in the rapids and being hurled down the stream. Big Morton saw it and so did Dick, but they were helpless, till suddenly Dick realized that if he could cut across country and over the south fork of the river, he could catch the unconscious girl on the logs at Two Mile Bend, and save her. He crawled through the under brush and made for Hallday's farm. There he got a horse, and reached Jones' Ferry at the south fork, but it was locked. He is pleading with Jones to unlock the ferry and help him save the life of Dolly Morton. The old ferryman saw his chance for revenge and refused. But Nellie took the keys from her father's hand and unlocked the ferry. Dick reached the fork in time to rescue little Dolly and bring her back to the Jones' home, where Big Morton finds her. Nellie brought the two men together again, while little Dolly snuggled close into John's arms.

THAT WINSOME WINNING SMILE (Sept. 9).—Winsome Winnie is besought by the Particular Young Man to go motoring with him and declining the invitation in order to help in the Charity Bazaar at the Armory. He goes with her, and the other girls decorate the booth. The other girls discover Winnie talking to a prepossessing looking man and they are highly incensed that while they work she flirts. But, when we look closely and see what Winnie is saying to the gentleman, we find that her smile has conquered the individual and he suddenly appears before the booth and makes the announcement that although he is the busiest man in the room, he intends to do all of the decoration for them because Winnie has smiled upon him.

When the sale opens her smile makes the customers flock around the booth so that they are soon sold out and still there is money offered. Winnie offers to auction off a kiss. The bidding is fast and furious from everybody. Old Colonel Dare finally makes the highest bid and wins the kiss, but not until the "busiest man in the hall" has tried to put in his bid, offering his last ten dollar bill for it. The Colonel takes the kiss, pays one hundred dollars for it and then Winnie finds that her own particular young man does not approve of this proceeding and is more than put out. We see her conquering him as she has conquered everybody else by the winsome smile.

NO COOKING ALLOWED (Sept. 9).—Two economical young ladies, art students, engage a furnished room intending to do housekeeping, but discover that cooking is not allowed. The girls are not over scrupulous about abiding by such oppressive rules and proceed to boil a head of cabbage, very much to the annoyance of a young doctor who occupies the room overhead. He promptly complains to the landlady, who assures him of an immediate investigation.

She demands to know the cause of the horrible odor emanating from their room. They explain that ill-smelling liniment they are using for a bad case of diphtheria is the cause of it. The landlady, fearing contagion, summons the young doctor, who responds to the call. Instead of finding a distressful case of illness, he finds two young girls in the best of health struggling convulsively to control their mirth. Both girls explain the situation to him and show him the contraband cabbage. Being fond of this article of food, he accepts their invitation to join the feast, and finds a girl of his own heart.

A QUESTION OF MODESTY (Sept. 6).—Ralph Earl, a young real estate agent, receives a letter from a "woman doctor"—Jane Joyce, M. D. She wishes to rent an office, and will call at noon. Ralph infers that she is some hopeless old maid. But "business is business," he will see her.

Dr. Joyce arrives. She turns out to be a beautiful and fascinating young woman. It's a case of love at first sight on both sides. So anxious is Ralph to have her near him, that he removes the furniture from one of his own offices and gives it to her.

After "Dr. Jane" had rented the office, Ralph insists upon introducing her to his mother. He takes her home.

Mrs. Earl, Ralph's "mama," is a hypochondriac, sits all day in a closed room, beside a table covered with medicines furnished her by her regular physician, Dr. Titus.

When Ralph and Dr. Jane arrive at "mother's," Jack suggests that Jane be his mother's physician instead of Dr. Titus. Mrs. Earl is not at all enthusiastic over this proposition. She snubs Jane cruelly. Jane and Ralph are thus forced to take their departure and go into the garden.

About this time Dr. Titus arrives, gives Mrs. Earl two more bottles of "dope," which he follows up with a proposal of marriage. Ralph enters.

Several days after this, while Mrs. Earl and Dr. Titus are motoring, they come upon Ralph and Jane in an affectionate embrace. She jumps from the car and hears down upon the young lovers. Seizing Ralph, she tries to drag him away. She slips—and falls.

Ralph takes Dr. Titus aside, and Jane examines the injured member. The leg is broken below the knee. The widow is carried home in the car. Then Jane leaves the party and returns to her office.

But not for long. When Dr. Titus attempts to operate, the widow rebels. Modesty forbids. The doctor is driven from the house by her angry expostulations.

Ralph hurries 'round to Dr. Jane's. She sets the leg, and soon the widow is very comfortable. A few days later Mrs. Earl commands all Dr. Titus's bottles to be thrown out by Jane and Ralph. She then gives them her blessing.

PARDON ME (Sept. 6).—Mr. Bobbs, an elderly gentleman and very polite, runs into the brush of a billposter and gets paste in his eyes. He begs pardon most effusively. He bumps into several other people and is continually getting into trouble. But each time he raises his hat and, bowing low, implores that his clumsiness may be excused. He finally interferes with a policeman making an arrest. The prisoner escapes. The policeman refuses to "pardon him," and so we find our hero crying out from behind bars, "Pardon me."

THE RANCH'S NEW BARBER (Sept. 9).—Red Dog is to have a lady barber. There is a sign to that effect in the window of a vacant store. The cowboys make ready to give her a rousing reception.

They hold up her stage coach, take the horses from it and drag her in triumph to the hotel. The next day they decorate the shop for her and draw lots for the chance to be the first man in the chair. The lady barber reaps a harvest of long hair, whiskers and mustaches, which the boys sacrifice at the shrine of their fair divinity.

About this time, Bill James is sent on an errand by his wife with instructions to hurry back. But unfortunately for his peace of mind, he wanders into the tonsorial grotto and is duly shorn of one-half of a luxurious beard.

Then his wife, who has become impatient at his prolonged absence and has gone forth to seek him out, discovers him. Bill is dragged from the chair and his wife takes him home and completes the shearing of her lamb.

Bills face bears testimony to her work.

As the boys have disgorged all their money and valuables in payment for their tonsorial debauch, the lady barber returns to her hotel, disguises herself as a boy and bids Red Dog a fond adieu, leaving a sign on her door reading as follows: "Gone to trim more whiskers."

BILL'S WARD (Sept. 9).—Rusty Wright and his chum Bill have been pals for years, standing by one another through all the hardships. Then they strike it rich.

Soon after Rusty is taken ill and on his death bed asks Bill to take care of little Georgie, to whom he wills his share of the "Little Georgie" mine.

Fourteen years pass and Bill is deeply in love with his beautiful young ward. But Georgie's love for Bill is the love she has for a father.

At this time Arthur Jennings, an Easterner, arrives at a neighboring ranch to visit his uncle.

He falls in love with Georgie. When Bill finds this out he becomes extremely jealous. Georgie returns Arthur's affection and they come to Bill for his permission. But Bill, still hoping to win Georgie, refuses.

He must give in in the end, however, to the man who saves his life. For when Bill is held up by thugs, Arthur arrives on the scene, puts the thieves to rout and brings Bill home.

DIVIDED INTEREST (Sept. 11).—John Converse is a young widower and the father of two little ones. Lester, the boy, has formed a strong attachment for Miss Stone, a pretty young woman, who returns the little fellow's affection. Margie, the little girl, is very much devoted to Mrs. Weeds, a pretty young widow, who also returns her affection.

Converse, seeing the strong love between the quartet, decides to win the heart of one of the women, but finding it almost impossible to choose between them, determines to test the two.

He writes a letter to himself, supposedly from his employers, stating that it will be necessary for him to take a business trip of two weeks. When he tells the two women of his intention, they beg to be allowed to take charge of their favorites, to which Converse naturally consents. Instead of going on the trip, he remains in the near vicinity to watch the two women, who prove faithful to their trusts. He can make no choice.

He writes a letter to each woman stating that her favorite has been stricken with smallpox. This test solves the problem, for Miss Stone, horrified at the contents of the letter, permits her fear of contagion to conquer her love for Lester. She writes a letter to the Converse home expressing her sympathy, but will not venture near.

Mrs. Weeds hurries to the Converse home and begs to be allowed to nurse her stricken Margie. Upon being ushered into the children's bedroom, she finds them enjoying a sleep. Not comprehending the reason for Converse's joke, Mrs. Weeds leaves his home in anger.

But he follows close behind her and after explaining the reason for his action, he prevails upon the loyal little woman to become the mother of his kiddies.

HIS GIRLIE (Sept. 13).—Betty Jordan and Ralph Raymond are very much in love with each other, but Betty's father thinks she is too young to marry and refuses to give his consent. Ralph is so persistent that Mr. Jordan thinks it best that he should not call on Betty any more, and forbids him from even seeing her. This is too severe a blow for the young couple, and they hit upon an idea whereby Betty shall be kidnapped. Ralph arranges with two workmen in his employ to take his automobile and go to the Jordan home and steal Betty. The men leave to kidnap Betty—but make a sad mistake. Mr. Jordan has thought it best to take Betty away on a short trip so that she will not meet Ralph. He has given the key of his house to a young couple who have just been married, allowing them the use of his estate for their honeymoon. The workmen arrive and steal the young bride. Ralph is scared to death when he finds they have an unknown girl. He hastens to the Jordan house with the bride, who is in a dead faint. Just as he is entering the house, Betty, who has stolen away from her father, returns. Explanations follow, the young bride and groom, Betty and Ralph, run over to the minister's home and there Betty and Ralph are married. They return home to find father very angry, but, as in most similar love affairs, father finally forgives them.

AL MARTIN'S GAME (Sept. 14).—Will Denton, a society man, tiring of the East, calls upon his chum, Harry Warner, and tells him of his resolve to go West. Harry gives Denton a letter of introduction to his father, who is a ranch owner in the West. Denton, seeing the photograph of Harry's sister, Helen, falls in love with it. Denton arrives in the West and meets a miner in hard luck, Al Martin. Denton buys Martin's horse and in doing so shows considerable money. Martin resolves to get it. Later on he holds Denton up, takes him to his cabin, where he and his Indian companion rob Denton of his money, the letter of introduction to Harry Warner's father and also the photograph of Helen Warner, which Denton had brought West with him. Martin decides to impersonate Denton. Leaving the Indian to guard Denton in his (Martin's) cabin, Martin calls at the Warner ranch and is cordially received by Warner and his daughter—in fact, it is a case of "love at first sight" between Martin and Helen. Denton, while being detained in Martin's cabin, is treated nicely. One day the Indian, who is Denton's guard, gets drunk and falls in a stupor in the cabin. Denton then manages to escape, but wanders around and finally gets lost in the desert. In the meantime Martin, whose love affair with Helen has been progressing very smoothly, arrives at his own cabin, only to find the Indian in a drunken stupor and Denton gone. Martin, who really likes Denton, fearing Denton may have taken the wrong trail and been lost in the desert, tries to find him there. Taking a bottle of water along, he searches for some time in the desert and finally finds Denton, almost unconscious from a terrible struggle in the desert from thirst. Martin, who has denied himself water while searching for Denton, is in pretty bad shape himself. He gives Denton the water, puts him on his horse and finally brings him out of the desert and back to the cabin. Martin then confesses to Denton what he has done, after which, though, hardly able to drag himself along, he struggles over to the Warner ranch and tells Helen all about his deception. She forgives him.

HOW ALGY CAPTURED A WILD MAN Sept. 4).—Phillip Stoddard and his friend, Teddy Windleigh, two wealthy New Yorkers, are acting as hosts to their sweethearts on a yachting cruise through the South Seas. One of the party, Algy Montmorency, an English fop and braggart, makes himself pretty solid with the girls by constantly telling of his wonderful exploits with a gun.

While passing an uninhabited island, later named Santa Cruz, they decide to go ashore and hunt goats. Algy protests, but is finally persuaded to join the party.

They have only been ashore a short time, when Algy and the girls, who have become separated from the rest of the party, are frightened almost to death by the sudden appearance in their midst, of a wild-eyed, long-haired, skin-clothed man of gigantic size. He had jumped from a ledge of rock above them. Algy, who has been telling the girls of his great deeds, gives one horrified glance at the wild man, and runs for his life. The girls thus deserted, run in the opposite direction. The wild man hesitates a moment, then dashes after Algy.

The wild man has almost succeeded in capturing Algy, when he is interrupted by the others and Algy is rescued. With the aid of ropes, the wild man is later captured and brought on board ship. The following day he gains possession of a knife and cutting his bonds, he grabs Algy and diving overboard swims to shore with the terror stricken Englishman.

Reaching shore the wild man carries Algy, who has fainted, to a cave and calmly sets about amusing himself by making Algy change clothes with him. He takes the braggart's revolver away from him and in examining it accidentally shoots himself in the foot. This gives Algy his chance to escape, which he does. The wild man follows and is captured by the rescuing party and for the second time hoisted on board the yacht. This time he is carefully guarded.

Phil and the girls overhear Algy explaining with great gusto to the assembled audience how he captured the wild man of Santa Cruz. The girls are convinced of Algy's lying abilities and turn from him in disgust. Phil and Teddy forgive them and all ends happily.

THE TOTEM MARK (Sept. 5).—Little Zeetah, a daughter of an old chief of the Mississaugas, was stolen by a marauding warrior of the fiercer Ojibways, and grew up in his tribe, where her beauty won her endless suitors. To all she turned a deaf ear, and the young squaws, seeing how her attractions prevented the bucks from paying proper attentions to their charms, conspired to rid the village of her.

Their opportunity came when she refused a proud young chief, and they declared her a witch. She was sentenced to be sent adrift upon a rapid stream bound in a canoe where her fate was sure, for beneath the village were terrible falls. Just at this time, the old Mississauga chief sent his son, Lotokah, to the Ojibways with presents, and he, discovering his sister's identity by her totem mark, was able to save her and restore her to her mother's arms.

A TENNESSEE LOVE STORY (Sept. 7).—Two Tennessee farmers, John Harris and Henry May, have been enemies for years. Harris's son, Ed, loves Pearl, the only daughter of May.

The lovers meet and Pearl agrees to marry Ed. But the parents of both object, and Will May threatens to kill Ed if he ever speaks to Pearl.

The following day Ed Harris and Will May go into the woods to hunt game. A deer is seen browsing. Will creeps up and is about to shoot when Ed shoots behind a bush, and the bullet missing the deer, kills Will May. Ed, unconscious of the fatality, follows the deer.

That night, Pearl elopes with Ed. They are married and go to a distant county to live. The next day, Will May's body is found by two hunters, one of whom, Daily, a friend of May, has seen Ed Harris hunting near the place where Will was found dead. Harris believes that Ed murdered his son, and he swears to kill on sight the man who killed his son and stole his daughter.

Time passes. Ed and Pearl are happy in their little home with their infant son. Daily discovers the pair and he informs Pearl's father, who arms himself and enters Ed's cabin to kill him.

Ed is rocking the baby's cradle. The old man raises his gun to shoot. A cry from the baby stays Harris's finger and saves Ed's life, for it gives the young father a chance to plead for his life.

When Ed swears on the Bible that he did not kill Will, old Harris believes him. When the young wife enters, she finds her father singing the baby to sleep.

ESSANAY.

THE DIAMOND GANG (Sept. 5).—The story begins with the receipt of a telegram by the chief of police telling him to search for three men, Jake Samuel, Jack Laclede and William Morrows, suspects in the Norcross diamond robbery. A young detective, Philip Bowen, is assigned to the case and after a search locates Jake Samuels, a diamond importer, supposedly, in a city office building. Disguised as the janitor, he overhears the conversation between the crooks and is about to make the arrest when the thieves apprehend him and gagging him and tieing him to a chair, leave him in the office while they hurriedly leave with the loot. With some difficulty Bowen slips off his gag, edges over to the 'phone and calls the chief. A squad of police, accompanied by Bowen, are soon in pursuit and a chase begins. The pursuers finally gaining upon them, the thieves desert their auto and take refuge in a deserted barn, where they fire on the police until their ammunition is exhausted. The capture is then easily effected and the three crooks dragged off to the police station.

THE DARK ROMANCE OF A TOBACCO CAN (Sept. 7).—Grace Williams, a little colored girl, working in a tobacco factory, slips a note into a can of tobacco. The note gives her address and her object—matrimony. Some years later young George M. Jackson buys the package of tobacco and hastens to his rooms, where he finds his lawyer, who hands him his uncle's will, in which is contained the information that young Jackson must marry within a week after his uncle's death if he wants his fortune. Nervously Jackson opens his pipe—and finds the note. With little hesitancy Jackson writes to the colored girl and tells her to come on. On the last day she arrives—to young Jackson's utter horror, astonishment and despair. She is put out, after which George proposes to the maid and drags her with all haste to the marriage license bureau, where the couple are married.

NEVER BELIEVE IN SIGNS (Sept. 7).—A lady laundress has a sign painted on the shutters of her house, which, when only one shutter is in view, makes a misleading statement. The legend that this one shutter bears is sufficiently interesting, however, to excite the curiosity of the male pedestrians who are passing, but their delight is turned into disgust when the saucy little laundress slams the other shutter closed and the complete sign is seen.

THE WRONG GLOVE (Sept. 8).—Arthur and Stella are much interested in each other, but at the choir rehearsal Arthur seems to pay more attention to Florence, the soprano. At the end of the rehearsal Arthur, whose anger is now aroused by Stella turning her attention to Fred, Florence's beau, tries to make matters worse by adoringly picking up Florence's glove, as he supposed, and thrusting it into his pocket. The quarrel seems to be a lasting one until one evening the young people are decorating the church, when Stella finds her glove in Arthur's pocket and thinks that Arthur's quarrel was really only a joke, when everything is settled up, much to the surprise of Arthur, who is only enlightened when he learns that instead of Florence's glove, he has been carrying and adoring his former sweetheart's.

BRONCHO BILL'S LAST SPREE (Sept. 9).—Broncho Bill of Snakeville, is on one of his sprees. Loaded down with all kinds of artillery, comes up Main Street, firing both pistols. He first visits the town bar and chases everybody out; he breaks into the hotel and causes a panic there; breaks up a prayer meeting; puts an English tourist to flight; grabs the boot off of "Alkali" Ike's foot and shoots at it in the air. Finally, tired of his sport, he borrows a horse and starts for home, shortly after to be pursued by the sheriff and his posse. Bill is asleep when they arrive and they have little difficulty in effecting his capture. In the meantime Broncho's mother arrives and starts for Broncho's place of residence. The "San Francisco Kid," her companion, enters first and informs the sheriff of the pitiable and lamented arrival of this trying moment of Broncho's mother. The sheriff finally agrees to exchange places for the time being with Broncho, and pinning the star to Broncho's chest, locks himself to Broncho and when the mother is brought in her son is introduced to her as the sheriff of Snake County. The mother then turns on the real sheriff and points out her son as a good example, telling him to mend his ways. She then gives the "bad" man a Bible which she had brought for her son, and tells him to read and try to be as good as Will. Only until Broncho's mother returns to the East does Broncho relinquish his star and after that the bad man is turned loose on his promise to keep to the straight and narrow way.

PATHE.

THE HERMIT (Sept. 4).—A man who is alone in the world loses all that he holds dear when his son dies. In consequence he leaves civilization and going to the wilds lives the life of a hermit. Near him is a man and his little family who are prospecting for gold without success. One day the little daughter of the prospector wanders away and is found by the hermit, who takes her to his cave, feeds her and gives her a nugget from his store, for during his years of hermitage he has acquired wealth. The little girl later tells her father where she saw the gold and he robs the old man, but is seen and followed. How the father is saved from death or disgrace by his little daughter is a most pleasing story.

HONORING A HERO (Sept. 6).—Col. Crosby, an officer in the Union Army and the father of a very charming daughter, with whom a young officer is deeply in love, is ordered to the front, and he and the young lieutenant lover take a sad farewell. On the field Col. Crosby is badly wounded and is sent home, where he subsequently dies. The heartbroken family wishing to keep the body near them, have the gallant soldier buried near the house. Later, when the war is over and time has assuaged the anger of war a movement is started to decorate the graves of those who died in war. The grave of Col. Crosby is overlooked, however, owing to its unusual place, and the story of the young lieutenant lover's devotion in winning recognition of the forgotten officer's resting-place makes a delightful romance.

THE REDMAN'S DOG (Sept. 7).—A ranch owner leaves his ranch and his daughter to carry the weekly payroll to the men on the job. On his way he is waylaid by bandits and taken to a nearby copse and tied to a tree; his horse, however, runs away and arrives back at the ranch house. Here his daughter finds it and calling to her aid an Indian working on the place asks him what to do. The Indian calling his dog finds the trail and by following the intelligent beast finally finds the ranchman in his unhappy situation. Then tying a note to the dog's collar he sends him after aid, which eventually arrives just in the nick of time.

THE CULTURE OF THE DAHLIA (Sept. 8).—This most interesting picture shows how the experienced horticulturist cultivates his dahlias and it tells its story so plainly that any one after seeing the picture should have no excuse for the raising of poor flowers of this kind. The dahlia is undoubtedly one of the garden beauties, and such a film as this ought to stimulate the interest of the community, and result in your home town being made even more beautiful than it is.

A TRAGEDY AT SEA (Sept. 9).—Two sailor lads are in love with the same girl and bad feeling between them starts when she shows her preference for Jack. Jim is a bad loser and on the voyage of the good ship "Robert Graham" more trouble brews over the cabin boy, who is championed by Jack when Jim wants to hit him. All this so works on the morbid mind of Jim that he decides on a terrible revenge, in which he must sacrifice every one in his desire to revenge himself on Jack. Just before Jim is to take his trick at the wheel he steals into the hold and lays a time fuse into the powder room, then going above and relieving the helmsman, he lowers the only boat and rows away. In a few minutes there is a terrific explosion and the great schooner is blown to atoms. Jim thinks all are lost and returns with the awful news that all are gone to a watery grave, but Jack, floating ashore on a spar, lives long enough to tell the true story, which leads to the arrest of Jim. The poor girl who awaited the coming of her lover so patiently hurns her wedding dress and we last see her in the cloisters of a nunnery.

A SOCIETY MOTHER (Sept. 5).—Madame Tabor is a social climber married to a man of limited means and she has never felt that her financial position was giving her ample opportunity to gain the social prestige which she desired. As her daughter, a fair and comely girl, comes to the age when she may enter society, the mother finds herself armed with a new weapon for use in her social campaign. The daughter is attractive and if she will but make herself agreeable will doubtless marry some man of wealth and thereby secure for her mother the aid of a monetary sore that will enable her to reach the heights for which she longs.

Scene from "A Society Mother" (Gaumont).

A rumor comes to the Madame that a wealthy and eligible bachelor will be in attendance at the next Ambassador's Ball, and she begins to lay plans to capture him for a son-in-law. On the evening of the ball she shows her thoughtlessness of the girl's feelings by forcing the modest child to wear a low-necked gown in spite of her aversion to the costume. At the ball the mother does the bulk of the courting and forces the maiden into the rich man's company as much as possible. He proves by his every action that in spite of his wealth he is only a cad. On every occasion she repulses his wealth overtures and finally tells her mother that he can make no headway with her independent child.

The society mother tells him to leave the matter in her hands, and has a distressing interview with the daughter, who is finally talked into submission, and after a brief courtship the engagement of the couple is announced. In spite of her protests the weddlug is celebrated. Fifteen days later the broken-hearted bride is reading a number of letters from her friends, congratulating her on her supposed good fortune, when her husband comes home badly under the influence of liquor and treats her with great unkindness.

She forthwith leaves him and returns to her home, where she is welcomed sympathetically by her father and sisters, but the iron-hearted mother clearly disapproves of her action, and returns with her to the drunken husband. Here in the presence of the revolting groom the society mother explains to the girl that for the sake of appearances she must resign herself to the prospect of a wretched existence for the rest of her life.

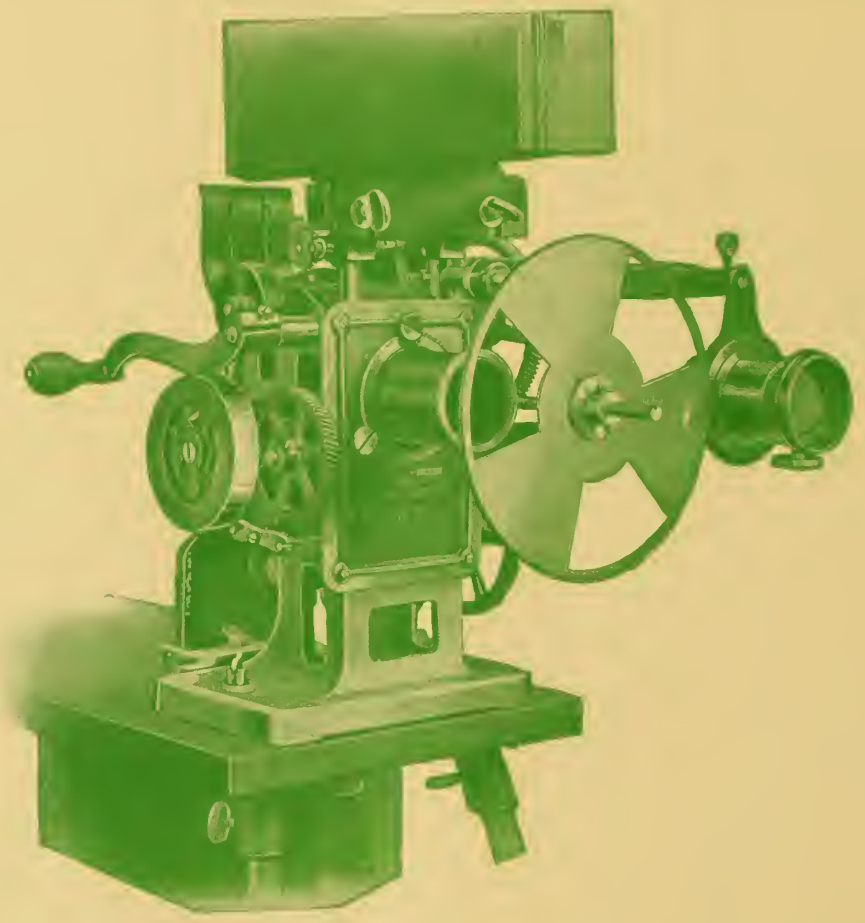
POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH NO. 6

THE PERFECT MOTION PICTURE MACHINE



"We have used the No. 6 machine for over a year and it has given us the best of satisfaction. Our patrons tell us that they have never seen a clearer or more steady picture."

Pomona, Cal., June 10, 1911. HOUZE BROS., Lyric Theatre.

"I want to say the Power's No. 6 is all right. If I were putting in any number they would all be Power's. I have seen a great many other makes, but have not seen any that looks as good as mine. I have two in my operating room here and I have three other houses and have six machines in all."

Conneaut, Ohio, June 12, 1911. J. C. FLACK, The Star Photoplays.

"I have used one of your No. 6 machines over a year and would not trade it for a new machine of any other make. Have never paid out a penny on the machine for repairs."

Bolivar, N. Y., June 13, 1911. A. L. MERRITT.

"After operating for five years from coast to coast, both on the road and in permanent houses, using almost every kind of machine made and under every kind of condition, have found the Power's No. 6 head is the only one really built to stand the strain."

Victoria, B. C., Can., June 2, 1911. P. KANE, Crystal Theatre.

You can't afford to be without a POWER'S NO. 6. Our partial payment plan, which is extended to established and responsible exhibitors, makes it easy for you to buy it.

MATED BY CHESS (Sept. 9).—Edwin and Marjorie are two lovers whose fathers, not being on friendly terms, will not consent to their engagement.

Marjorie has several girl friends visiting her and in the course of their play a quoit ring is accidentally sent into the adjacent garden, where Edwin's father, who is working out a chess problem, is unexpectedly crowned.

Marjorie sends a servant to recover the ring, but the old man is indignant and refuses to give it to him.

Marjorie's father, therefore, goes to insist upon an immediate return and is about to commence a heated altercation when his glance falls upon the chessboard.

He pauses to consider the problem and soon the two enemies are pitted against each other in an exciting chess match.

Each places his child as a stake in the game. Each loses a game and using these results as an omen of good, the fathers consent to the children's engagement.

FARMING—OLD AND NEW METHODS (Sept. 9).—In the first picture we have an excellent representation of the old fashioned plow, slowly and laboriously dragged across the fields by a pair of horses, while in the second picture a vivid contrast is afforded by the view of the plow with multiple shares drawn by a powerful motor traction engine. This film affords a striking idea of the march of progress in agricultural matters.

OLD AND NEW METHODS OF FARMING (GEO. KLEINE).

ECLIPSE.

CLEVER BEYOND HER YEARS (Sept. 6).—Little Jane, a child of eight years, takes the management of a large farm during her mother's illness.

SCENE FROM "CLEVER BEYOND HER YEARS" (ECLAIR).

She proves herself to be an excellent superintendent, keeps a watchful eye on every one, shows herself a wary dealer both in selling and in buying.

While keeping in touch with the many details of the farm management, she still finds time to care for her mother and for her little baby sister.

LAKE THUN IN SWITZERLAND (Sept. 6).—In this film the spectator is taken across Lake Thun, running through the Swiss Canton of Berne, and back, a distance of about twenty miles. For picturesque scenery, Lake Thun almost equals the matchless beauty of the Lake of Lucerne, and is deservedly popular with the tourist in Switzerland. The shores of the lake are dotted with quaintly built villas, standing in beautiful gardens, and nestling amidst the richest foliage. A pleasure steamer, crowded with passengers, is seen gliding peacefully between the town of Thun and the Interlaken plain, and as the tour proceeds the villas and gardens give place to precipitous shores, and splendid views are obtained of the great snowy peaks of the Bernese Oberland range of mountains, while above the lake rise the wooded heights of St. Beatenberg. Strikingly picturesque also are the mountains of Stockholm and Nieden.

LAKE THUN (GEORGE KLEINE).

On the return journey a very beautiful tinted view is given of the sun setting behind a mountain range.

MELIES.

THE HOBO COWBOY (Sept. 7).—"Happy" Larry, a tramp, was taken suddenly sick, and staggered into the nearest house, wherein were seated Bill Smith and his only child, a little girl in her teens. Bill was for putting the tramp out, but the girl recognized something good in his face, and begged her father to admit him. Her word was law in Bill's house.

"Happy" soon became well under Gertrude's ceaseless care, and when it was time to depart, Bill presented him with a suit of clothes to start life anew. He also offered him a drink of whiskey, but Gertrude was quick to obtain his promise to remain "off the stuff."

"Happy" decided to quit tramping and earn an honest living. He gained employment at a ranch as a cowboy, and it was not long before he gained popularity among them all. He took their hazing and jokes with perfect good nature and was dubbed the best sport on the ranch.

One day the boys layed before him their request that he run for sheriff. "Happy" was embarassed, but the boys held him up with revolvers and made him promise. "Happy" won out, of course, as everyone expected, and his work as sheriff was creditable. Not long after his election, however, Bill Smith had a quarrel with the saloon keeper, in which he shot and wounded the latter. A posse was formed, and, headed by the Sheriff, tracked Bill to his home. "Happy" held the boys off and himself placed handcuffs on his old friend Bill. Just then Gertrude entered and ran into her father's arms. She turned and pleaded with "Happy." It was too much for the latter. He could not resist the appeals of the girl who had nursed him back to life. With his revolver he made the boys put their hands up until Bill had time to cross the border. Then he threw down his gun and surrendered.

Some of the boys were for lynching "Happy," but one level-headed fellow suggested that he have a chance to tell his story. When he repeated how Bill and his daughter had saved his life and made him what he was, the boys' anger relented and Bill was forgiven.

But this Sheriff, although once a hobo, had too much conscience to continue in office. He wrote the boys that he had not done his duty and that he guessed that after all he was made for a hobo. Donning his old clothes he slipped out unnoticed and hopped the first "freight."

THE HAUNTED HOUSE (Sept. 4).—Cabel Davis, a miserly old skinflint, holds a mortgage on a house belonging to Samuel Perkins, and is scheming to buy it cheap. Perkins is poor and has a handsome daughter, Mary. Davis calls and insists on the payment of money due and Perkins tells him he cannot meet the obligation. Davis leaves, threatening him.

The old miser conceives a cunning plan to prevent the mortgaged house from being rented, and makes visits to the old house, using a sheet and emitting ridicous noises to convince the villagers that the house is haunted. The place is visited by several, who go away terror-stricken, as the old miser takes a black cat up through the cellar-way and shows it through the window.

In the meantime, Milton Dawson, a young station agent, meets Mary Perkins and falls in love with her. He learns from the people in the village that the Perkins house is haunted. He decides to do a little investigating, and trails Davis to the house and sees him enter through the cellar.

Young Dawson follows and sees the old villain drape himself with a sheet and step out on the roof. He follows and finds Davis on the roof with a crowd below, scared out of their wits. The old man appears with the sheet draped about him. Dawson steps out, and grabbing him, snatches off the sheet and exposes the fraud to the gaze of those horrified below. Davis is brought down on the sward and confesses his nefarious scheme, and is despised by all his neighbors. So penitent is he that he writes a release of the mortgage in the presence of the crowd when in danger of bodily injury. Dawson takes the paper to Perkins and astonishes him by his revelations. He is very grateful and summons Mary and it is all explained to her. Dawson is not satisfied with thanks and takes the shy young girl in his arms and she is not offended.

DUTY (Sept. 7).—Homer Gardner, the light keeper, ascends the tower to light his lamps and soon after the mechanism that rotates the tower becomes useless, owing to a broken part. Gardner is appalled at the consequences. His wife is ill and he has no one to depend upon except his small son, Willie. Hastily summoning the boy, he assigns him the task of turning the tower, while he rows to the mainland in a skiff, to obtain repairs to the light. Bidding the child goodbye, he sets forth.

The sea is rough, but he makes the first part of his journey without mishap, and sets out on the return trip. He runs his boat on a rock, and a plank is splintered. The boat rapidly fills and sinks and, he takes to the water and swims in the direction of the light.

The boy becomes exhausted from his exertion. The mother notices that the light is not reflected seaward. She staggers up the steps, weak and ill, and finds Willie unconscious in the tower. She looks out upon the water and observes a ship headed for the rocks. She revolves the light and the ship is providentially saved.

Gardner manages to drag himself up the slippery steps of the lighthouse and enters the living room, to find his wife gone. Staggering up the long and tedious stairway he finds her, exhausted, but still at her post, turning the light.

Later, the captain of the vessel that was saved by Mrs. Gardner visits the light and presents the husband with a medal. The big-hearted keeper of the light in turn presents it to the brave woman who kept the light revolving.

RELIANCE.

THE GODFATHER (Aug. 26).—A woman is loved by two men and marries one. The disappointed suitor becomes the godfather of her baby boy and goes West, after depositing $5,000 to the credit of the baby,—an amount won on a horse race. The husband's gambling proclivities cause the woman much sorrow, and after his death she is wrapped up in her boy. On his 21st birthday he receives the money, and against the entreaties of his mother, loses it gambling. Ashamed, he goes West and becomes involved in a quarrel in a card game with his godfather, whom he shoots in the arm. He is about to be lynched when a ring upon his finger is recognized by the man as one he gave the baby more than twenty years back. The youth's life is saved, and the terrible lesson makes them both renounce gambling. They go East to the boy's mother, who is overjoyed to see her boy again, and who looks with loving eyes upon her old sweetheart.

A STRAIGHT PATH (Aug. 30).—A busy man neglects his wife. Even the serious illness of his boy fails to keep him home and the child dies in his absence. A friend, in love with the woman, takes advantage of every opportunity to be with her. A youth, driven to desperation, breaks into her home and is captured by her at the point of a gun. He breaks down, sobbing, and tells her a story of privation which touches her heart, and she gives him some money and a photograph of her dead boy as a reminder that the only road to

THE CALL OF THE WILDERNESS.

SCENE FROM THE "CALL OF THE WILDERNESS."

A wealthy young Londoner, tired of city life, journeyed to Colorado, married a pretty Indian girl and had settled down to a peaceful Western life when word reached him to return at once to London to claim an estate. He went alone, and tried the society life, but the yearning for the woods was too great. He heard the call of his little bride and returned, but too late. A broken heart had been given eternal rest.

happiness is the straight path. A year later, still neglected, the friend pleads her to elope with him, and she finally consents. At that moment, the boy comes back to return the money, and the woman, not recalling his name, he sends in the photograph of her child. It brings back her words that the only road to happiness is the straight road, and she recalls in horror at her contemplated deed. Her husband suffers a breakdown from overwork and finds his wife sobbing on the little bed of their departed boy, and a realization of his fault causes him to ask her forgiveness for his neglect, and casting aside business cares, he takes her on a second honeymoon.

AMBROSIO.

THE DOOR-KEEPER (Aug. 30).—The old doorkeeper has a weakness for cards, and while engrossed in his game he forgets his duties. The tenants of the building, unable to secure admittance to their apartments, finally locate him and succeed in instilling in him a sense of his obligations.

TWEEDLEDUM'S WHITE SUIT (Aug. 30).—Tweedledum wears a white suit and is caught in the rain. He stubbornly proceeds on his way and encounters so many accidents that he is forced to return home in a pitiful state.

BISON.

AN INDIAN LEGEND (Aug. 29).—Waniga, the pretty daughter of the Mohawk Indian chief, falls in love with Flaming Arrow, an Ottawa brave. The romantic wooing is carried on amid great dangers. Waniga's tribe holds a pow-wow and plans an attack upon the Ottawas. She warns her lover, who prepares an ambush and defeats the attacking forces. Her treachery is punished by tying her in a canoe and sending her down the stream to death by drowning in the rapids. Flaming Arrow sees the canoe drifting down the stream and rescues her, and she is taken into the tribe.

THE SHERIFF'S LOVE (Sept. 1).—The Sheriff's sweetheart transfers her affections to another man, who turns out to be unworthy of the girl. While appropriating the day's receipts at the tavern, he shoots the proprietor, and the sheriff and posse riding hot on his trail, trace him to his home. The sheriff enters to arrest his man, but the pitiful pleading of the woman and her child prompt him to give the man another chance, and he permits him to escape. The posse is indignant and menacing, but finally forgives the sheriff for his fault of a too large heart.

THANHOUSER.

COUNT IVAN AND THE WAITRESS (Sept. 5).—Count Ivan, a wealthy Russian nobleman, is a dreamer, but not of revolutions. A bachelor, he has drifted into a placid old age, happy with his music and his books, and never contemplating any changes in the social conditions that surrounded him. But, just the same, he is accused of conspiracy, and to escape a sentence to Siberia that means death, he flees to America, landing practically penniless.

Music now becomes his sole means of support. He secures a position in a theater orchestra, and manages to earn a meagre living, until he incurs the enmity of the leader, and finds himself out in the street again.

There is a little, shabby restaurant, where the Count is accustomed to dine. The waitress, a self-reliant young woman, likes him for his courtly manners and his unfailing politeness.

To obtain some money, the Count pawns his violin. The dealer sees a chance to get rid of a bad bill, and passes it on his unsophisticated customer. When the latter offers it at the restaurant, he gets in serious trouble, and would have been arrested, had it not been for the interference of the waitress, and the fact that the policeman summoned happened to be the man to whom she was engaged.

Later, when the Count falls exhausted in the street, it is the girl and her sweetheart, who aid him give him shelter and restore him to strength.

The Count's friends in Russia although they have lost sight of him ,have not been idle. They manage to prove to the Czar that aged musician is not, and never has been, a conspirator. A royal pardon is issued, and search for him is started. This hunt ends successfully, just when the unfortunate Count is at the lowest depths.

His first thought, when he regains his wealth, is to reward the humble friends who stood by him when he was "a friendless old man." He buys the restaurant where she is employed, leaves a fortune in the cash register, and departs for Russia, realizing that he has safeguarded the future of the girl whose unselfishness deserved the reward she received.

AMERICAN.

ANNA HARRIS IN THE CHICAGO SWIMMING MARATHON (Aug. 24).—The Illinois Athletic Club annual river marathon, in the Chicago river, was an event of unusual interest. Sixty-four swimmers entered for the contest, which was won by Joseph Steuer, whose time of 43:21, over a course approximately one and one-half miles, is considered remarkable, in view of the conditions. The temperature of the water, between 58 and 60 degrees, was the coldest ever encountered in a similar swim. As a result, only nineteen of the original field finished. Steuer literally plowed his way through the water, using the Australian crawl and changing his stroke whenever necessary to rest himself.

THE WESTERN DOCTOR'S PERIL Aug. 28).—Doctor Arthur Kenwood receives an urgent call to a distant ranch. His way lies past the depot, and he passes shortly after a lone bandit has held up the agent and shot him. Charley Going, the brother of the agent, arrives on the scene in time to see his brother breathe his last and the doctor riding rapidly away from the town. He hurries to where the boys are loitering, with the announcement that Dr. Kenwood has shot his brother and has gotten away with the express company's money. A posse is formed, and they ride out in pursuit of the doctor. The fleeing bandit drops one of the money sacks, and the doctor finds it. He stops at the watering trough to refresh his horse, and is overtaken by the posse. Instead of his usually orderly deputies, the sheriff finds that the sight of the doctor infuriates them to a point where they desire to lynch his prisoner, and he has hard work to protect the doctor, and lodge him in jail. Charley Going frets at the law's delay in meting out justice. The sheriff is wily and guards his prisoner closely, for he fears the boys will take the law into their own hands at the first opportunity. Going hits upon a scheme to decoy the sheriff away from town, and kissing his little daughter, he goes to the boys to unfold his plan to them. They write a note to the sheriff, telling him he will find the real murderer at Bear Rock. He hurries away. In the meantime, Charley Going's little girl meets with a severe accident. Mrs. Going is frantic, and hurrying to the sheriff's house, she pleads with his wife to release the doctor that he may attend the child. The sheriff's wife tells her that it is impossible, but her womanly sympathy wins. When Charley Going and his lynching party arrive at the jail to force an entrance, they learn that the man they have come to slay is at their leader's home, saving the life of his only child. They hurry to the house. Reverently they lift their hats, as the doctor works, oblivious of their presence. The false note leads the sheriff to the real murderer, counting the money he has stolen. The sheriff makes him prisoner and hurries back to liberate the doctor. He arrives just as the doctor arises from the couch, the child is sleeping quietly, the danger passed. Charley Going steps forward and the doctor extends his hand, which is eagerly clasped by the penitent father.

THE DIAMOND SMUGGLERS (Aug. 31).—Jack Cooper and Ben Williams find that smuggling jewelry across the Mexican border is a profitable business. They are accumulating money at their nefarious trade, when one morning a little incident changes the whole tenure of Jack's life. He is riding along the trail when he finds a girl whose skirts are tangled in a barbed wire fence. He goes to her assistance and succeeds in freeing her, for which she thanks him and hurries away. After she is gone, he finds a piece of lace clinging to the fence, and removing it, he places it in his pocket. Jack resolves to see the lady again, and rides up the trail. He finds her and is invited to meet her mother. This visit is followed by others, until he is deeply in love with Ethel Volmer. He tells his partner he is through with smuggling for good, and Bill is deeply disappointed. Bill takes to drinking and gambling, and loses all his money, as well as Jack's. Jack has won the love of Ethel and plans to buy an interest in the ranch; when he comes home to claim his share of the money he learns that Bill has lost it all in gambling. He is keenly disappointed, but plans to make one more haul. He is detected by a ranger, who summons a posse and starts on his trail. In his extremity he rides to his partner and tells him of what has happened. Bill sees also a chance to vindicate himself with Jack. Taking the sack of smuggled jewels he rides out on the Bad Lands and fires his gun to attract the attention of the ranger and his posse. He is pursued and shot. Dying, he sees a vision of Jack and Ethel, happy in their love, and he knows that his sacrifice has not been in vain.

THE COWBOY AND THE ARTIST (Sep. 4).—The story opens with the betrothal of Charles Garvin and Clarice Winslow. They are extremely happy, and Ed. Gardner, a wandering artist, in search of lodging, is afforded a pleasant welcome to the girl's home, and greeted by the young cowboy. Charley leaves for the round-up and his sweetheart is amused by the artist. He amuses himself by playing with the heart of the simple Western girl, and when her cowboy lover returns he finds her in the arms of the artist. Leaving the faithless girl, he enters into dissipation and becomes intoxicated. While in this condition he picks a quarrel with the artist, but is interrupted by Clarice, who leads the artist away. Ed. Gardner plans a trip to the mountains. He starts on his journey alone. Arriving in the mountains, he beholds a scene of natural, rugged grandeur, that would make a beautiful picture. Satisfied, he proceeds to rapidly sketch the scene before him, until the falling dusk warns him it is time to return to the ranch. Gathering up his materials, he seeks the passage by which he entered, but is unable to find it. As the evening approaches, Clarice, at the ranch, awaits for him, and when he does not return, she becomes alarmed. He does not appear the following day, or the next, and full of apprehension for his safety, she seeks the boys and asks them to make a search for her lover. One by one they refuse, knowing the dangers of the canyon. Charley Garvin is the only man who knows the dangerous country, and at last Clarice asks him. He takes his canteen and starts upon his dangerous search. Ed. Gardner is about to give up the struggle. Tearing a leaf from his notebook, he writes a few lines and places the note in his breast pocket, and makes one final effort, only to fall back exhausted and unconscious. Charley Garvin comes upon him. He sees the note and reads it. Blind fury seizes him and he is about to go away and leave the helpless man to his fate. His honorable nature prevails, and, returning to Gardner, he picks him up and starts on his return. He conducts Gardner to the ranch, where Clarice and her mother are awaiting him. Gardner starts forward to clasp the girl in his arms. But Charley interferes. Gripping him by the arm, he calls his attention to the note. The artist attempts to wrest it from his grasp. Still holding him firmly, Charley silently extends the note to Clarice, who opens and reads: "If my body is found, notify my wife, Mrs. Ed Gardner, Bronx Apartments, New York City." Mortified at the duplicity of her erstwhile lover, the grief-stricken girl is sheltered in her mother's arms, and Garvin orders the artist to be gone.

THREE MILLION DOLLARS Sept. 7).—Mr. Joseph Close, ranchman, with his wife and daughter, visit the town for supplies. The daughter makes a hit with the storekeeper and it is with difficulty that the ranchman induces his daughter to leave.

They return home, and the ranchman finds a letter in his mail box from Wm. Schrider, Attorney-at-Law, informing him that his brother is dead, and has left the sum of three million dollars to his daughter, on condition that she produce an official certificate of her marriage one month from the date of her uncle's death.

He hurries to the house with the glad information, and his wife rejoices with him. They call Estella, and are astounded when she refuses to get married.

The ranchman offers his cowboys one thousand dollars each if they will help him. He suggests that they go to town and kidnap a handsome man and also abduct his daughter.

Accordingly, some of the boys are detailed to abduct the daughter, others to kidnap the handsome storekeeper, and the ranchman himself goes after a justice of the peace.

The daughter is secured with little difficulty, but Arthur White puts up a strenuous fight before he is tied up.

Leaving their captives bound and blindfolded, the cowboys repair to the opposite side of the barn for a friendly game of cards.

Arthur succeeds in freeing himself and is very much surprised to find his fellow victim is the girl that has captivated his fancy.

They mount a horse and ride away. The cowboys discover that their captives have escaped and start in pursuit.

The ranchman arrives at the barn with the justice, to whom he has offered a fat fee to perform the marriage ceremony. He is surprised to find everyone gone.

Estelle tells Arthur of the letter her father received. Arthur suggests that they go back and get married.

Returning to the barn, they replace the ropes, and blindfolding themselves, they await the return of their captors.

The ranchman meets the returning cowboys, who tell him their captives got away. They return to the barn, and are surprised to find their prisoners bound and blindfolded as they were when first captured.

The justice then performs the marriage ceremony and everyone is happy.

ECLAIR.

ALL ON ACCOUNT OF A COAT (Sept. 14).—Mr. Maurice goes away on a journey. His wife takes advantage of his absence, to invite his friend, Henry Baitup, to spend the evening. The maid employs the services of Charles (a species of panhandler), in delivering the note, and Charles profits by his visit to such an extent that he returns to Mr. Baitup's apartments in the evening and succeeds in donning a suit of clothes. Dressed in borrowed plumage, Charles struts among his friends in favorite haunts, into the ballroom of a neighbor of Mrs. Maurice, whose apartment joins that of her friend, who is giving a dance. Charles makes a tour of exploration, and crossing a balcony, enters the apartment of Mrs. Maurice. Unaware of the presence of Henry and Mrs. Maurice,

SWORDS AND HEARTS

A Story of the War Time in Old Virginia

As Hugh Frazier, son of a wealthy tobacco planter, leaves to join his company in the Confederate Army, he becomes engaged to Irene Lambert, a beautiful but cold and calculating girl, who promises her hand when he returns victorious. Unknown to Hugh, Jennie Baker, a little girl of the "poor white class," has fallen passionately in love with him. Her father is one of those who hate the "aristocrats," eking an existence selling berries, etc., from their little garden. Hugh, making a flying visit to Irene, is only saved from capture by Jennie's devotion, she taking his horse and donning his hat and coat, by which she leads his pursuers astray. That night, Jennie's father is killed leading an attack by bushwhackers upon the Frazier Mansion in an attempt to secure the family wealth; but old Ben, the negro servant, anticipates their designs by taking the family strong box and burying it. The bushwhackers, however, burn the old mansion to the ground, Hugh's father perishing in the ruins. Hence, when Hugh returns he finds himself homeless. Irene has turned her attentions upon a Union officer, but Jennie is still faithful. Hugh now sees her worth, and old Ben appears with the strong box which has remained hidden since the night of the attack.

THE BARON

Two waiters, vain of their personal appearance, have their photographs taken by an itinerant photographer. The boss catches them and "Fired!" is the result. One of them hits upon a scheme to get easy money by posing as a baron. Things are coming his way, when he is met by his erstwhile friend, who gives the snap away. However, he would have succeeded in marrying an heiress, but for a mix-up at the license bureau, giving him a dog's license instead of a marriage license.

THE VILLAIN FOILED

An unsuccessful suitor gets his rival drunk so as to win the girl away from him. The intended victim's friends, however, thwart the villain's plans by making it appear that the girl's sweetheart had attempted suicide because of her coldness. This so impresses the girl that she consents to an immediate marriage to the young man by the minister they have called in.

Charles plies his trade. The noise disturbs the couple, who think it is the husband. In a short time, the husband does return, and Charles, disturbed at his work, throws off Henry's coat—the coat is left behind. The police are called, and find in the pocket of the coat, the card of Mr. Henry Baltup. Henry is arrested, brought back, and accused. Then, the butler and valet bring in the real culprit, Charles. The real burglar is apprehended, and the anxious lover freed from his embarrassing predicament.

HOW POOR BABIES ARE REARED IN PARIS (Sept. 11).—There are many institutions in Paris which reflect credit upon that renowned city. Foremost among these, is the "Baby Home," which is noted for the care and attention afforded the little tots, and of which this film treats. We are invited to witness the bath and toilet of the little ones, and the daily weighing: we are shown how the babies learn to walk and enjoy the pretty sight of the "Five O'Clock Recreation Dance."

HOW TEDDY LOST HIS BET (Sept. 11).—Teddy, the Champion Cyclist, after a victory, is celebrating with his friends. They come across a cripple, upon whom the champion looks with disdain; the latter challenges the famous cyclist. The idea is vociferously ridiculed by all except a stranger, who offers to back the cripple with his bank roll. The professional accepts, and agrees to give the cripple a handicap of 500 yards. The start is made, and away goes the wonderful cripple, while the confident champion leisurely mounts his wheel and follows. The cyclist meets with unthought-of obstacles en route, over and through which his rival has adroitly wended his way. Bruised and panting, Teddy at last reaches the goal, just in time to witness the triumph of his competitor, for the crippled sport knew the road best—and Teddy had lost his bet.

THE TORN SCARF (Aug. 31).—Antone and Jose, two brothers, work to pay off the mortgage on their vineyard. Jose lives with his brother and Rose, his wife. Antone goes to town with a consignment of wine, and in his absence a scarf-dealer calls at the shack, and tempts her to purchase his wares. The gaudy scarfs appeal to her. The lure of the colors is on her, and unable to deny himself the sweet pleasure of owning it, she goes to a niche in the wall where the brothers hoard their meager savings, and with the hard-earned bagatelle buys the scarf.

Her brother-in-law, upon his return to the shack in the evening, asks her how and where she obtained the scarf, and the woman lies to avoid incriminating herself. But Jose divines the truth, and seeking the money, discovers it to be missing. He denounces her as a thief, and the woman, to save herself from having her offense disclosed to her husband, plunges her stiletto into her brother-in-law. In the short struggle which follows the guilty scarf is torn. Leaving him apparently dead, she rushes from the house. Then the realization of the full enormity of her double sin dawns upon her, and stricken with repentance and remorse, she re-enters the house. She works hard to bring the man back to consciousness, and at last her efforts are rewarded. Pitifully, she pleads for her brother-in-law's silence, asking him to spare her from her husband's execration. Her tears at last accomplish what her rage and stubborn struggle failed to achieve; she wins Jose's forgiveness and friendship, and upon the return of her husband he claims the ownership of the torn scarf, thus shielding his erring sister-in-law.

THE FOUNDLING (Sept. 2).—The poor mother cannot support her babe, and leaves it on the wayside, where it is found by a young couple, who take it home and nurture it in luxury. Their fondness for the foundling causes jealousy, and two members of the family plan to have the infant kidnapped. Meanwhile the mother has been engaged as nurse to her own child. She is loved by John, who delivers the mail to the house, and he proposes marriage to her, but she declines to wed and once more leaves her child. The jealous members of the family enlist the services of a gypsy, who carries off the child. The mother is distracted. A chase ensues, and the woman's lover tracks down the gypsy, and the child is recovered. The complicity of the other members of the family is discovered, and denouement speedily follows. In the end, the young mother is happily married to John.

CHAMPION.

GRANT AND LINCOLN (Sept. 4).—George Wharton leaves his Southern home to fight for the North. While in camp he chastises a fellow officer for insulting a lady and thereby gains his enmity. George's sister has a sweetheart, who is a Confederate officer, Robt. E. Lee. He was now a prisoner in the Union camp, and therefore when Martha wrote a letter to her brother George, she enclosed a note to Robt. E. Lee, a namesake of the famous General Lee.

George gets his mail, but unfortunately drops the letter to Lee, which falls into the hands of his enemy. The latter opens it, only to find a harmless missive. Notwithstanding, he forges an incriminating letter, supposedly for Gen. Robt. E. Lee, and places it in the original envelope, laying it where George will find it. With this accomplished, George is arrested through his enemy's connivance, tried and condemned.

The lad now sends a note to his sweetheart, the girl he had saved from insult, and she informs his sister. His sweetheart attempts an audience with Grant, but with no avail. Before this took place, the Confederate officer had escaped.

Meanwhile, George's sister also arrives and is also refused the pardon by Gen. Grant. She snatches a revolver from the belt of his servant and forces the general, at its point, to grant her request. The girl now dashes off to tell her story to Lincoln. Just then the Confederate officer, who had been re-captured, is brought in and he verifies her story. The pardon is granted.

While George's sweetheart is holding up the villainous officer at the point where the condemned youth is to die, his sister rides up with Lincoln's pardon. A double union takes place, and four young people reap their reward.

WHEN THE LAW CAME (Sept. 6).—The opening scene deals with a large and wooly town in which the Vigilant Committee and Judge Lynch is all paramount. But civilization was reaching out with a tamer's arm in the persons of judge and lawyer. When the serene looking judge pinned the badge of sheriff on big Dave Hopkins, the crowd enjoyed the occasion as a huge joke, and piled into Gorman's saloon to "liquor up" on the head of it.

It wasn't long before the new arm of justice was put to a test. Jasper Jones was a brute in his liquor cups, and at such times he would beat his child. Handsome Dave Marrou one day, being attracted by the cries of the little one, arrived just in time to prevent the father's brutality.

Jones swore a vengeance against him; but as he held and fingered the trigger of his gun, it suddenly went off and he fell in the throes of death. Now upon the arrival of Dave, the little one had crept under the cot, and when the parent fell dead, she came forth and wildly fled in terror from the house, finding refuge with the Governor's daughter, Bertha Pierson.

News of Jones' death soon circulated, and the judge was soon on the spot, with the sheriff and Dave Marron. Dave was innocent, but as he had fought with the man, the judge suspected him. Then the sheriff had to arrest him. Dave was adjudged guilty, and sentenced to death.

Dave had a sweetheart, the governor's daughter, Bertha. Fate ordained that she should learn from the little baby girl how her father had died. She sought her father and obtained a pardon. Thus it came about that as the drop was about to be sprung by Dave, the messenger dashed up with the paper of freedom, and Dave's life was saved.

THE PATCHED SHOE (Aug. 30).—Andy Noodles, an adventure-craving rustic, reads the advertisement of a bogus detective agency, where, for the sum of $10, they will make him a "member of their force." After receiving his "Commission" and "Star," he sallies forth in search of adventure. He sees John Martin climbing out of his own window, having been locked out by his little daughter Mabel. Andy takes him for a thief, examines his footsteps and discovers one of his shoes has a patched sole, and follows the trail. Then follows a series of funny incidents in which several people wear the patched shoe and Andy follows them all. He ends up in the Martin home and is finally thrown out, much to the amusement of all but Andy, who leaves, swearing never again.

THE HOLD-UP (Sept. 1).—Lieutenant Harris and Mr. Drake, a wealthy but unscrupulous mine owner, are both in love with Colonel Barnes' daughter Ethel, but the Lieutenant is the favored one, much to Drake's chagrin. He swears vengeance. Later on he hears Lieutenant Harris and some of his brother officers laughingly conspiring to hold up the ambulance, which is returning from the station, with some of their comrades. They think if they disguise themselves effectively and do the job in true "bandit" style, it will be a great joke.

Drake utilizes his knowledge to wreck the Lieutenant's hopes and possibly lose his life.

He immediately informs the colonel that the ambulance is to be held up, but fails to inform him that it is a joke or who the "bandits" really are.

The colonel immediately sends a troop of cavalry to stop the "hold-up," with orders to "shoot to kill." They are just about to fire on the supposed brigands when Kitty, a friend of Ethel's, who is cognizant of Drake's intentions, arrives on the scene just in time to prevent a tragedy. However, the "bandits" are marched to the colonel for explanations, but he likes the lieutenant and his comrades, and realizing that they meant no real harm, lets them go with a reprimand.

YANKEE.

INSHAVOGUE (Sept. 4).—Brian Maguire, known as the "Inshavogue," struck terror to the hearts of the enemies of Ireland and was worshipped by Ireland's peasants. In a mountain fortress, he defied the entire British Army, and at last, when the struggle for freedom seemed hopeless, the British offered to the Inshavogue the following terms if he would leave Ireland: A pardon for him and his patriots, a large sum of money and land, and a free passage to his newly acquired property in one of the British possessions, but when Inshavogue came among them, he was immediately handcuffed, shackled, and cast into prison.

Inshavogue escaped into the mountains, left his wife in a peasant's hut and that same night she gave birth to a baby girl and lost her own life.

On the very same night, Lady Roderick, the owner of the estate, gave birth to a baby girl, who died almost immediately, and the physician in attendance, who had also attended the wife of the Inshavogue, takes the motherless babe of the Inshavogue and changes it for the dead body of Lady Roderick's child. The child grows to beautiful girlhood as the daughter of Lord and Lady Roderick. At her eighteenth birthday she is told her true history, and through the knavery of Sir Francis, a disappointed suitor, she meets her father; Inshavogue, when he realizes that the girl is truly his daughter, proclaims himself to the peasants and patriots of Ireland.

He is cast into prison and is pardoned through the influence of Lord and Lady Roderick.

FADED ROSES (Sept. 8).—Two country boys go to the front in the battle between the North and South. Jack West, the younger of the two, loves the village belle, Bessie Brooks, but being of a bashful nature he is unable to declare his love, still he is eager to let her know of his love and he sends her a bouquet of flowers, within which he encloses a note declaring his love and begs her to send back by messenger one of the flowers, which will signify that she returns his love. Bessie receives the bouquet, but does not see the note and tells the messenger there is no answer. Jack awaits the return of the messenger and when the boy returns empty handed, he leaves broken-hearted.

Thirty years later they meet again, she a spinster and he a bachelor. Jack now a Colonel in the Union Army, asks her why she refused his love thirty years ago. Bessie professes ignorance of any love declaration and the Colonel recalls the incident of the note in the bouquet. Bessie leaves the room and returns with a box, which she tells him has never been opened. Together they open the box and amidst the faded leaves there lies the note proclaiming Jack's love. Although thirty years later, Bessie gives her lover a satisfactory answer.

MESMERIZING MOE (Sept. 8).—Two jovial sportsmen, after a successful day of fishing, come upon old Uncle Moe, tight asleep with a fishing pole in hand. They decide upon having some fun with the old negro, removes his line from the water and attaching a large fifteen pound fish to his hook, they throw it into the pond. Uncle Moe is awakened by the jerk and is surprised when he pulls out a large fish. Chuckling with delight at his apparent success he goes to another part of the stream. As he leaves the spot the two jokers appear and detaching the big fish from the line, replace it with a very small one. When Uncle Moe returns with a very small fish he had caught at the other part of the stream and goes to put it on his line, imagine his surprise when he draws forth a small fish in place of the large one he had left there. Uncle Moe begins to imagine he is seeing things, and decides to change his location again. Taking the two small fish, he ties them together, examines them critically and drops them into the water, after having secured the end of the string to a rock.

When he returns the jokers had already been at work and when he draws up the string he finds two fifteen pounders in place of the two little ones he had left there. Uncle Moe decides not to take any further chances, and shouldering the fish he hobbles toward his hut in the hills. This is more than the jokers bargained for and in order to obtain their own fish they are compelled to buy them.

BILL AS A GAMEKEEPER (Sept. 1).—Bill having applied successfully for the post of gamekeeper, is set upon his duties. Laden with guns and gamebags, he makes his way through the woods until he surprises two poachers. Without more ado he takes shelter behind a tree and fires. The miscreants fly, with Bill's grotesque figure in full chase behind them. They take refuge in a tree, but the new gamekeeper is fully equal to the occasion and prepares to follow. He is not as nimble as his prey, however, and gets rather badly left behind until he catches the poachers in a river. Boldly he follows, but his bags are too much for him, and he sinks beneath the surface. He is fished out at the eleventh hour by a couple of anglers, who promptly stand him upon his head and administer artificial respiration.

THE INVISIBLE WRESTLER (Sept. 1).—A certain famous wrestler challenges all comers, and, in response, there steps forward a dapper young man, who certainly seems no match for the burly professional. But there is more in him than meets the eye, for no sooner have the combatants closed than the newcomer renders him-

THE PARSON AND THE BULLY (Aug. 30).—Parson Lewis, who with his wife and two daughters had selected a little Western town for their headquarters. Jim Hadler, a gun-fanner, with the support of White Hanson, ex-prizefighter, had been the boys' acknowledged ruler, and had no intention of another usurping that rule. He not only broke up the parson's first meeting with his gun, but knocked him down when he remonstrated with Hadler for attempting to kiss his daughters.

The parson that night sent a letter to his son, Webster, telling him to come out at once, as he had found a community and needed his assistance. So annoyed was Hadler at the old gentleman's persistence, that when Webster arrived, the bully declared that nothing short of the young parson's conquering his friend, the ex-prizefighter, could persuade him into allowing the Lewis family to remain there.

Webster, being an amateur boxer, accepted the challenge and the boys insisted that they would stand by the champion, whoever it may be.

On the day of the fight the combatants in regular fighting attire in a ring begin fighting. In the fifth round the young parson shot over a solar plexus blow and an uppercut, which laid the ex-prizefighter on his back insensible.

The next day the prinzefighter, his friend Hadler, and the boys went to church to hear the parson's first sermon.

MUTT AND JEFF AND THE GERMAN BAND (Sept. 2).—Mutt and Jeff take a stroll, and this time they stroll in the path of a strolling German band. The clarionet, the piccolo, the cornet, the sliding trombone, the big bass horn and miscellaneous other brass noise-makers are seen in action—they are also heard by the butcher, the baker, the candlestick maker, the housewives, the street arabs, etc., who fire a volley of pennies and nickels at the German players.

Mutt soon tackles the sliding mysteries of an old sliding trombone and Jeff struggles in the mighty grasp of a dilapidated bass horn. Professor Schmitz, evidently another schemer, claims to teach music in all its ramifications in one lesson. Mutt and Jeff "fall" for this one lesson, and, being matriculated musicians, they make a bid for the people's small change.

Jeff spies a blind man mechanically turning the crank of what perhaps once was an organ, and sees the "coin" go in the direction of the man who cannot see. If he does not see the money coming, certainly he cannot see it "going." Mutt takes the bull by the horns and expedites matters. The loose change "goes."

POWERS.

BLACK CLOUD'S DEATH (Aug. 22).—Black Cloud, while drowning, is rescued by Little Crow, an Indian of another tribe. Black Cloud takes him as a brother. Both fall in love with the same squaw. Little Crow is chosen by the tribe to carry the totem bag to a friendly tribe. Little Crow is afraid, so Black Cloud takes his place. He is wounded in a battle with a tribal enemy, but returns with a message in the totem bag, which he gives to Little Crow, who carries them to the chief of his tribe. Running Fawn, thinking Little Crow is the hero, agrees to be his squaw. The deception is found out and little Crow is sentenced to the wolf pit for twenty-four hours. Again Black Cloud takes his place, comes out unscratched, and Running Fawn, realizing he is the hero, and that she loves him, throws herself in his arms. Little Crow, in frenzy, tries to kill him, but Black Cloud disarms him, and satisfied that he had paid his debt, lets him go.

AN INDIAN'S LOVE (Aug. 26).—Young Oak, a Shawnee Indian, deeply loves Blue Bird, a Choctaw Maiden. She is also loved by a half-breed gambler. Her father loses all at the cards and Half Breed suggests playing his money against the girl. The old Indian consents. The half-breed wins, as usual, and takes the young squaw with him. Young Oak, when he hears of this, takes the trail and overtakes the half-breed on a fallen log stretched across a deep chasm, where we see one of the most realistic knife fights that have ever taken place. Young Oak defeats the half-breed and as he plunges the knife into his chest, the gambler falls to his death below. Young Blue Bird gladly allows Young Oak to lead her to the tents of his people.

RED FEATHER'S FRIENDSHIP (Sept. 5).—Red Feather, an Indian brave, is attacked by a half-breed enemy, but is saved by the owner of a nearby ranch, who takes Red Feather to his home and puts him to work on the ranch, for which Red Feather swears eternal friendship. Tom Hogan, the foreman of the ranch, endeavors to make love, first to the ranchman's wife, and then to Red Feather's squaw. Red Feather finds it out, tells the ranchman, who thrashes Hogan and drives him from the ranch, making Red Feather the foreman. Hogan, for revenge, entices the ranchman's wife away by sending a letter purporting to come from Red Feather's squaw, asking her to come to a mountainous retreat, where she met with an accident. On her arrival Hogan captures her. In the meantime the ranchman and Red Feather find the letter, take the trail and arrive on the scene as Hogan tries to force his unwelcome attentions on his former employer's wife. A shot from Red Feather's weapon gives Hogan his just deserts and the Indian repays his debt.

THE TWIN SQUAWS (Sept. 9).—Prairie Wolf and Golden Rod "twin squaws," are in love with two Indian braves. Sam Jones, a cowboy, is discharged from the ranch for drunkenness. He joins an Indian tribe and becomes a renegade. He is discovered trying to make love to both the squaws and is severely chastised by one of the braves, who would have killed him but for the other Indians' interference, who informs him that he is a member of the tribe. The Indian brave lets him go with the warning that if he ever attempts to insult Prairie Wolf again he will kill him. The renegade, for revenge, sends a letter to the ranchman's daughter, enticing her away. He also entices the twin squaws and one of the braves to the same place. He captures and drives them all at the point of a gun to the mouth of the bear pit, where he is about to plunge them all to their death, when Blue Eagle, the other Indian brave, who has taken the trail, arrives. He kills the renegade, rescues the twin squaws and saves the ranchman's daughter.

CORRESPONDENCE

SAN FRANCISCO.

The Moving Picture Exhibitors' Association here is trying to have a law passed to put nickelodeons on an equal basis with the larger theaters, as the law now reads that Nickelodeons with a seating capacity of 400 or more, are not allowed to have people standing in the lobby behind the seats, while in the more pretentious theaters, they are permitted to stand.

The San Francisco Censor Board has eased up on coudemning pictures of late, owing, apparently, to two reasons, namely: the exchanges were making vigorous complaints and said they wouldn't stand for so much unreasonable condemnation, and the newspapers roasted the board thoroughly for putting their veto on reels without any plausible reason. They semed to enjoy particularly a grudge against the "Great Northern," and censored them so persistently that Mr. Markowitz, manager of the California Film Exchange (Ind.), refused to buy any more of that company's pictures. For a while as high as four reels a week were cast aside at the dictation of the board.

The Grand Theater is getting in the race too, and are running 3 first-runs a day, supplied by the Gen. Film Co. Alborn & Leahy are the proprietors.

The Globe Theater has cut out its vaudeville and is running five first-runs daily. It used to tag reels with the Lyceum, but now tags with the Garrick, two miles away. Two motorcycles are kept busy speeding the films back and forth.

A new theater called the Hayes Street has opened with a seating capacity of 1,200.

S. Pinkus, connected with the Wigwam Theater in an official way is the smiling kid these days. He, with two associates, is building a new theater at Polk and Clay Streets. It will open the first of the year near the entrance of the fair grounds. It will have a seating capacity of 1,200, and will run Licensed pictures.

The People's Theater, in the Mission, has cut out their vaudeville and piano player and are now running only pictures (Ind.).

The Essanay moving picture stock company is still in San Raphael and from the looks of things they are going to stay a while.

Manager L. J. Chamberlain, of the Theatorium, gave two "feature nights" week of Aug. 14. The first was on Monday, when Selig's "Ten Nights in a Barroom" was given. The second, on Wednesday, when "Enoch Arden," by the Biograph Company, was given. Capacity houses ruled both nights and an orchestra of four pieces was used, with special music arranged by W. C. Beane. In the last scene of "Enoch Arden," O. J. Powell rendered "Meditation," by Morrison, on the chimes in an able manuer. Many requests have been made to the management for a repetition of these pictures and there is no doubt but that Mr. Chamberlain will grant the requests during the fall. Other "feature nights" are to follow as soon as the films desired can be obtained.

On August 22 and 23 the M. W. A. held their convention here and in honor of this occasion. Operator "Doc" W. E. L. Reeger "done himself proud" in decorating the front of the theater. Not only is "Doc" a good operator, but he is "some" decorator as well. Business at this house is fine.

A special feature film was cast on the screen at the Missouri Airdome Monday night, Aug. 14, when "The Tale of Two Cities" appeared. This film is fully 3,000 feet in length, and requires a run of 45 minutes. In order that there should be no delay, the management utilized two operators and two machines. The advance announcement of this film drew large crowds.

The Lyric Theater has booked the Pathe Weekly. It was scheduled to appear Aug. 15-16. Some of the subjects of interest are: "Bob Burnham at Point Breeze Track," where he established several records; "The Knights of Columbus at Detroit," in which members from all over the country appear, and several other interesting incidents.

The Ideal Theater, at Lempard and Lynch Streets, is reported for lease. It is a modern equipped building, seats 400; also has gas engine, motograph machine, dissolver, etc. The location is excellent for the winter season. Freund Bros. are the owners.

The St. Charles Theater showed several feature films this week. "The Blind Princess and the Poet" proved a very interesting subject, showing the extremities of true love, while "Jealous George" was a very amusing subject which enolved everything the name implies. "The Promoters," a Kalem product, also proved to be a high-class film.

Wm. Burton, a staff photographer on an evening paper, has signed to appear at the Aubert Airdome Sunday night, with a selection of his own pictures. The title of these is: Burton's Illustrated Storiettes. Mr. Burton tells a story on each picture cast on the screen. Saturday night, Mr. Burton will flash some of his "Current Events" pictures, amongst which are some interesting pictures of the famous 10-mile swim, the start, the finish and the winners, will be flashed. Mr. Burton has met with unusual success since producing these views. This will probably be a weekly feature at the airdome.

From the Patrons View Point

What Causes People

to continually patronize one Picture Theatre in preference to another? Of course, location, appearances, films, etc. have a great deal to do with it, but quality of the picture is what builds up a steady patronage that makes the business profitable.

This depends largely on your light and if you are using any other device than a to step down your current you are not getting best results.

With our machine you can produce a clear, white, steady light that won't worry your "house" by continuous flickering and will surprise you with the difference it makes with the films.

It is the only device that can be changed instantly to any of the three intensities without breaking the circuit between adjustments.

But this is not all. We will guarantee that our Compensarc

Will Cut 65% from Your Light Bill and we'll send you one on 30 days' free trial to prove it.

We have a little 22 page booklet that explains all the reasons why If you want a better light at ⅓ your present cost, send for it today. It's free.

MR. EXHIBITOR:

You Can Now Read ANNOUNCEMENT No. 4

THE NATIONAL PROGRAMME on the road is proving a SENSATION. We never doubted that it would for one moment. The investment in the proposition runs into big figures; nothing short of UNEXCELLED QUALITY could have induced us to undertake it. We know the business, we know the difficulties of the market and we knew these things before we got into action. We have shown no tendency to haste, but slowly, conservatively and surely, we mean to drive home these very facts.

We selected September 7, 1911, for date of first release because we could not whip all of our elements into shape before that time. We have tackled every phase of the problem "SERIATIM," which in plain English means every step in its order. The first policy we chose for settlement was the policy of the organization and we adopted the EXCLUSIVE idea. Frankly we cannot conceive of anyone in the game doubting the wisdom of point No. 1. Next we tackled the makeup of the programme itself HERE and contracts abroad. We sent two men on the European trip with every facility to undertake business relations. They visited every country of Europe and returned with PRODUCTS SO STRONG, SO NOVEL, SO GOOD, TECHNICALLY OR FROM ANY VIEWPOINT, THAT WE KNOW: NO SKEPTIC can, after seeing our programme, feel any different about it than we do, namely, it is the biggest asset ever handled in the business for any person who has occasion to handle film. Having done these things we rested long enough to get the facts before you—see the list. If there is anything you want to know, write or wire us, but, above all, avail yourself of the opportunity to see the goods as per ANNOUNCEMENT No. 3.

A. EXCLUSIVE AMERICAN.
"PLANTATION" "ROSE" "FEDERAL" "WASHINGTON" "MOHAWK" "OKLAHOMA" and "CALIFORNIA". Other American releases to follow.

B. EXCLUSIVE IMPORTATION.
"CLARENDON" "MONO" "HELIOS" "LATIUM" "MONDIA" "HEPWORTH" "FILM D' ART" "AQUILLA" "SAVOY" "CAMERIA" "MESSTERS" "DEUTSCHES BIOSCOPE" "CROIX & MARTIN" and "DEUTSCHES BIOGRAPH".

C. SPECIAL ATTENTION.
AN EMPHASIZED FACT.

WEDNESDAY, September 7th, 1911, Exhibitors begin showing EXCLUSIVE NATIONAL PROGRAMME and every day thereafter.

D. WHY?
BECAUSE, the above mentioned goods merit themselves under position of class, quality, variety, (comedy and drama.) They are so different and of such high class that you are compelled to praise them.

E. ANNOUNCEMENT No. 3.
Has been sent and is now en route, so try and ACT.

F. ORIGINAL.
SPECIALLY DESIGNED ONE SHEET POSTERS IN FOUR COLORS EACH SUBJECT.

G. DIGNITY OF DECISION.
After viewing, CRITICIZE and you will find that we have stated the facts.

"MUTT and JEFF and the GERMAN BAND"

(Some Noise, Believe Muh!)

Mr. David Horsley,
147 Fourth Ave., New York City.
Dear Sir—The MUTT and JEFF comedies have made such a big hit in my house that I have instituted a MUTT and JEFF Day. That is, I advertise that every Wednesday these pictures will be shown. and it is a fact that my Wednesday business has increased on account of it.

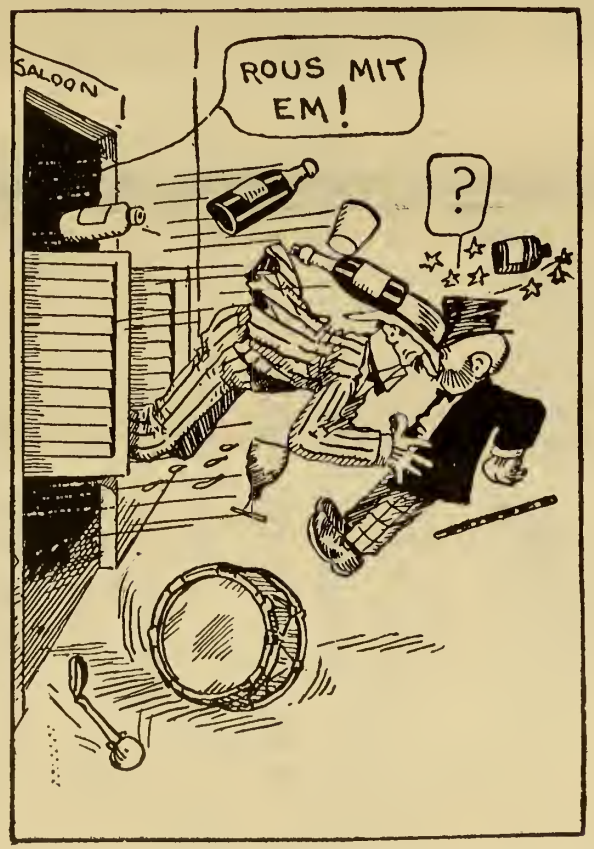
They not only afford much amusement to my patrons, but they also break the monotony of the every-day class of moving pictures.

Keep on manufacturing them and earn the thanks of the public and the exhibitor.

FRANK L. BROWNE,
Mgr. Grand Theatre,
Rutland, Vt.



Mutt and Jeff

forever plunging into the bubbling waters of the Ocean of Mirth, encounter a German Band, also a blind organ-grinder. This "do-re-mi-fa" business is all to the good—it separates the people from their small change; so MUTT and JEFF decide to enter the musical ranks. Imagine Mutt with a sliding trombone and Jeff in the huge embrace of a bass horn! Their antics, not to mention the fortissimo playing of the German Band, and the pianissimo of the sightless organist, create no end of boisterous and infectious mirth. Show it and your patrons will swell the mighty chorus of laughter.

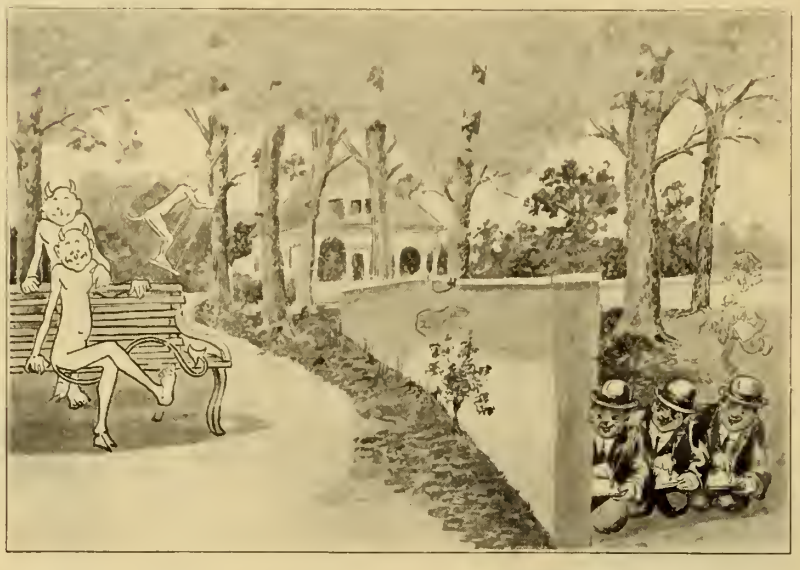
IMPS ARE COPIED UNsuccessfully



They copy Imp plots. They copy Imp posters. They copy Imp ads. They copy Imp lobby displays. But they CAN'T copy that indescribable SOMETHING that makes an Imp an Imp. You've noticed it scores of times. You've talked about it. All of which is proof that you can't get Imp quality unless you get Imp films. If you can't get Imps any other way, pay a little more film rental and get a contract specifying that your service will include TWO IMPS A WEEK WITHOUT FAIL! Tell your exchange you're willing to pay a little extra to be sure of getting TWO IMPS EVERY WEEK. You'll get quick action. And you'll get big returns! Try it!

"THE HAUNTED HOUSE"

(Copyright 1911 by IMP CO.)

Love, melodrama and comedy all boiled down to the very essence. Write to your exchange every morning till you get "The Haunted House." Released Monday, Sept. 4th.

"DUTY"

(Copyright 1911 by IMP CO.)

Another great melodrama of the sea, the kind the people all love to see. The mechanical effects in this picture are simply great. Insist upon "Duty." Released Thursday, Sept. 7th.

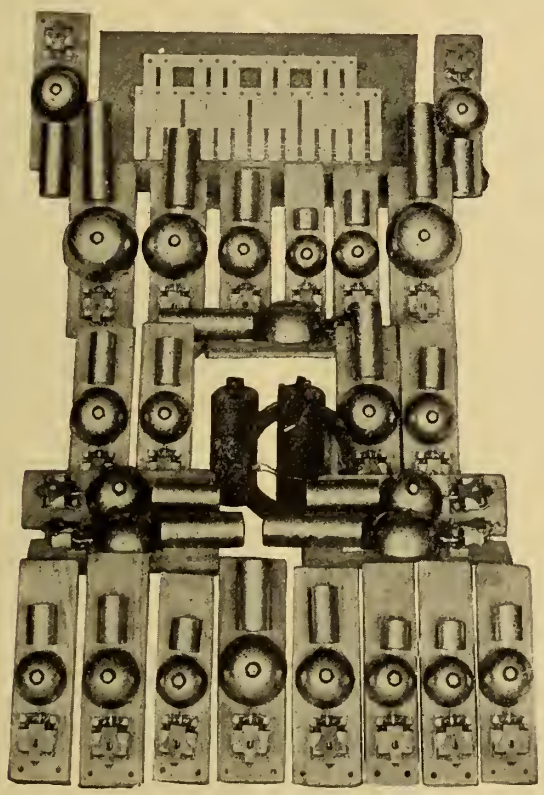
Deagan Bells

Are a real attraction for Moving Picture Theatres.
So hundreds of satisfied exhibitors write us.

All prominent show houses use our Bells, or other musical instruments of our make.



Complete set ready to ship.

Be progressive and go one better than your competitor.

A set of Deagan Bells will give distinction to your theatre and increase your patronage at once.

Deagan's Musical Electrical Bells are made of finest bell metal, as per our own formula, and are fitted with our Patent resonaters which add fully 100% to the tone of the Bells as well as making the sound sweet, clear and silvery.

The Bells are played from a key board, same as a piano, and any one can play them with a few minutes' practice. They are correctly tuned to your piano, and can be played as a solo instrument, with or without piano accompaniment, as an accompaniment to songs, during intermission, etc.

The key board can be placed in any desired location and the bells be mounted in any part of the house, on the ceiling, side walls, under seats, corners, odd places, etc., producing the most startling effects to endless surprise and delight of the audience.

Any person can install a set of these Bells in a few hours; no experience is necessary, as complete instructions are included with each set.

We can supply you a complete outfit of these marvellous Bells for $40.00 and up.

Don't miss this opportunity. Write to day for terms and catalogues.

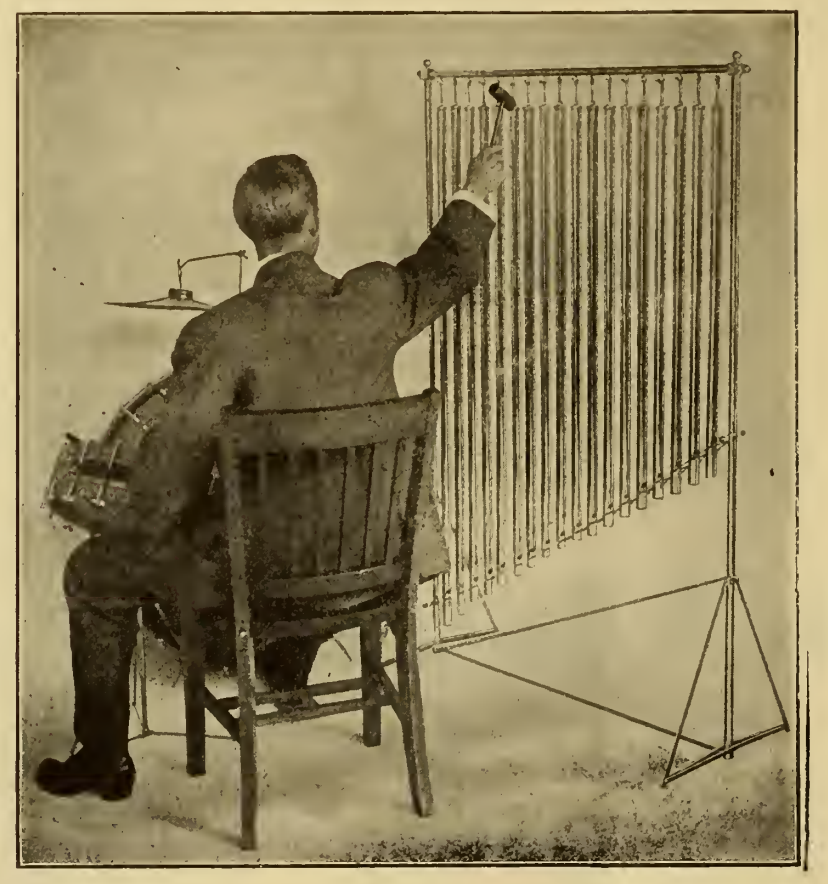
SMALL CHIMES

A Complete Set of 18 Tones



The only difference between these Chimes and our Cathedral Chimes is in size. They have the same quality of tone, the same compass (one and one-half octaves chromatic), and are finished in the same manner.

They are a trifle less than five feet high and are 3½ feet in width. As you can see by the illustration, these Chimes take up very little floor space, and the performer can play them without having to change his position.

Although the combined weight of the Chimes and rack is but forty-one pounds, they are not toys by any means, but a complete set of real Chimes with volume and power sufficient for any size Auditorium.

There is a peculiar fascination about Chimes that appeals to all classes of people, and there is no place where they can be used to a better advantage than in a Moving Picture Theatre.

Order a set on trial—if you are not perfectly satisfied we will refund your money.

MAKE 'EM YOURSELF SLIDES

Make them yourself. Written with pen and ink or typewriter. Three minutes to make a slide. Used for advertising slides, to announce future or feature programmes, for chorus slides when chorus slide is missing. We send four colors of gelatin. The slides look well and any one can make them. They are handy also for announcing vaudeville acts. In fact they may be readily used for anything you may wish to say to your audience.

For the sum of three dollars ($3) cash with order, we will send by express, charges not prepaid, the following:

24 cover glass, 1 package binder strips, 1 dozen mats, 1 instruction sheet, 1 form sheet and 50 strips assorted colors gelatin—enough for from 300 to 400 slides. Order now. Address at Chicago in 1903 will never be forgotten because of the terrible, needless, inexcusable sacrifice of 596 lives. Same old story of a panic-mad audience piling upon each other in the vain effort to escape through fire-doors that would not open. The Von Duprin Self-Releasing Fire Exit Latch opens fire-doors instantly at the slightest pressure on a solid bar stretching across the door, about waist high. This device has never failed—it cannot fail. Try it and see why. Try it now. A day's delay may cost hundreds of lives. The demonstration will cost you nothing. Catalog?

The Iroquois Theatre Fire

KEEPS 'EM COMING

The cool, airy, perfectly ventilated theatre gets the crowd every time. Nothing drives away patronage faster than a foul, hot, stuffy show-room.

Keep the crowds—and the profits—coming your way by using

WATSON MOTOR-DRIVEN VENTILATING FANS

Move the greatest volume of air at least cost and with least friction and noise. Their cost is inconsiderable compared to the increased profits they bring.

Write today for full particulars and interesting booklet on ventilation, telling how you can determine the size of fan required.

Exhibitors Who Know

Tell us that the Edison Underwriters' Type "B" Kinetoscope stands absolutely alone as the machine which never fails to do the work required of it, even under the most strenuous circumstances. They know because they have tried others and found them wanting. What's the use of a lot of experimenting when you'll come to the Edison eventually? Isn't it advisable to start right so long as we can show you by the experience of others and from what we know of the machine ourselves that the Edison is the one which will make your show all you desire it to be?

Let us discuss the matter with you in detail.

The James Boys in Missouri"

We have just finished the most stupendous film ever produced in America

At an Outlay of $10,000.00

Don't confound this with any inferior James Boys film—Get the real one.

¶ This feature film will give you the quickest money returns providing you get in now. ¶ Every scene thrilling and exciting. ¶ The locale is absolutely correct and each action plain and decisive. ¶ We have followed the history of this Famous Band from 1865 to 1882 giving the story of their adventures in Missouri. ¶ Staged and photographed on Missouri soil and in many instances exact localities where this Famous Band operated. ¶ Camp scenes—specially provided train for hold-up—guerillas and soldier skirmishes.

250==People in Production==250
50==Horses==50

¶ Dressed and staged in the period of the times. ¶ Historically correct—Beautiful scenic environment—and perfectly enacted. ¶ Get busy by wire, long distance phone or correspondence. ¶ Don't let any one get ahead of you for STATE RIGHTS. ¶ Now is the time to get in on the ground floor of the greatest money making film production of the age. It will beat all box-office records everywhere it is shown.

POSTERS! CIRCULARS! DODGERS!
BANNERS! STREAMERS! CARDS!

We have opened offices and employed capable men to assist State Rights purchasers to book and route this remarkable production.

We have taken 5000 feet and cut it down to approximately 3100 feet (3 reels).

Notice to exhibitors—To save time exhibitors should send in requests for dates at once. As soon as State Rights are sold correspondence will be turned over to purchasers of State Rights. This way you will get quick action.

You can see a demonstration of this picture in St. Louis any time after August 28th.
Announcement will be made in next week's issue of demonstrations in Chicago and New York.

"LOCHINVAR" IS COMING!

MR. INSISTER

Mr. Insister says: If you want a lively Love-and-War story INSIST on "The Buddhist Priestess"; if you want a strong Mother-Love story INSIST on "In the Chorus"—you'll always find your pick in

THE THANHOUSER WO-A-WEEK

RELEASED TUESDAY, SEPT. 12

See the Battle in the Temple

THE BUDDHIST PRIESTESS

was a mere pretty pink-and-white thing whose only care in the world was her pet doves, and yet whose simple nod meant death to the unfortunate who incurred her wrath. The monitor of the morals of thousands of human beings, hers was a high place and a pleasant one, and had she chosen to remain in it she would be there in pomp and state still. But all this high station and all this ease and plenty she gave over—for love of a stranger. He was a very dashing Yankee naval officer, and she fell head-over-heels in love with him and head-over-heels from her throne for him. But the picture leads you to suspect she was happier for the change.

No. 245. Code Word, Buds.

"IN THE CHORUS."

RELEASED FRIDAY, SEPT. 15

"And the Best Friend of All Is Mother"

IN THE CHORUS

was where a mother found her long-lost daughter, in time to lead her from temptation and back to protecting hands. Also the finding led the mother herself back to the path that was narrow, and from which grief at her great loss had caused her to stray. The story is one of the most touching AND PLEASING we have ever filmed. It is difficult to make a heart-throb reel of this variety without a SURPLUS of sad things, but you really find such a reel here. It will cause some tears, but not enough to generate real gloom, and you needn't play any ragtime music to make your patrons forget its lesson.

No. 246. Code Word, Incho.

Facts and Comments

THE value of the educational picture, so constantly emphasized by THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD has found practical recognition in the prosperous and progressive State of Wisconsin. The legislature of that State has, at its last session, appropriated the sum of $150,000, part of which is to be used in the purchase of moving picture machines and suitable films. This means that the representatives of the people have officially sanctioned the aid of the picture in elementary and advanced education and in university extension work. It was for these purposes that the money was granted. It is, under the circumstances, neither visionary nor optimistic to expect similar steps in other States. The teachers are ready for the educational film, the pupils are eager for them, but the producers of this kind of film are slow to recognize the demand and supply it.

What has heretofore been labelled "educational" or "religious" film, has not been purely and specifically educational and was never intended to be such. While many of these pictures have a distinct educational value no attempt has heretofore been made to produce a series of films, which would be an equivalent to a text-book in history, geography or physics, or any other branch of exact knowledge. The production of educational films, in order to be of permanent value, must proceed according to a system. To devise a proper and effective system, the advice and cooperation of men and women, eminent in educational work, must speedily be enlisted. A golden opportunity both for profit and usefulness awaits the film maker who will take the lead in this new departure. When a demand exists in educational circles for the haphazard and irregular historic, scenic and literary film product, it is safe to assume, that a systematic production with an eye single to the needs of the school, carried on under the direction or, at least, with the assistance of experienced and competent pedagogues, will at once command a steady and most desirable market.

The subject is so vast and fraught with so many possibilities that it is bound eventually to engage the attention of the best and most intelligent educational bodies in the country. THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD sincerely believes that the educational branch of the film industry will before long, rival the amusement branch in extent and importance. It means, therefore, to give it every possible attention and support. The constantly growing host of the friends of the truly educational film will find these columns an ever ready forum for intelligent discussion and careful consideration of this great topic. The establishment of an educational film exchange, in close touch with the needs of schools of all degree, is to THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD more than a dream or a theory and will soon take definite and practical shape, under the direct auspices of the General Film Company.

* * *

A POLICE court judge in Virginia refused to hold a defendant, charged with having published sensational pictures of a notorious murder trial. The right to print fair reports and publish pictures of public trials is, of course, guaranteed by the constitution of nearly every State. The film producers will, however, take no advantage of this decision. Pictorial portrayal of crime and scandal is the exclusive prerogative of the yellow press. The moral of the moving picture is miles above this level and the monopoly of jaundiced journalism is in no danger from the moving picture.

IN the reports of a panic at an opera house in rural Pennsylvania, where a moving picture entertainment was in progress, the papers show far more fairness and regard for truth than would have been thought possible in such a report two years ago. Whatever loss of life occurred is in the newspaper accounts justly ascribed to the panic that seized upon the audience. Even so persistent and malicious enemy of the moving picture as the "New York World," says in its report: "Deaths alone due to fright. Flames did not follow." It appears that a fuse blew out, probably in the operating room, and instantly a panic followed. "Senseless Rush for Stairs Causes Trampling of the Weaker One"—reads one of the headlines.

How did this panic ensue so quickly? It is, of course, impossible in the absence of further reports to form an accurate judgment—only one thing is certain. If the public, even at this day, is full of a foolish fear of fire in connection with every exhibition of moving pictures, if the slightest suspicious noise suffices to convert rational human beings into senseless beasts, at whose door must the blame be laid? The press, instead of enlightening the public and taking the word of experts has always insisted that the moving picture machines and the films were slumbering volcanoes and that the dangers of eruptions were many and always present. The reams of cruel nonsense about the danger of moving pictures at the time of the Boyertown disaster are not forgotten by moving picture men. They were the innocent sufferers and if that sort of libel has now gone out of fashion, they have no one to thank but themselves and THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD, which has labored incessantly, conscientiously and in some degree successfully in order to correct and enlighten public opinion.

* * *

THE weekly output of films at the present time exceeds sixty reels per week. One cannot help asking two questions in connection with this truly extraordinary fact. Has quality kept pace with quantity? At this millions will rise up (including a few dozen critics) and say in a voice of thunder: "No." The next question is: "Has this increase in quantity been the result of a genuine public demand?" Not so as to be visible to the ordinary powers of perception. Even a popular film maker takes a risk by increasing the number of his releases. Such things cannot be and should not be forced. From reliable information we are led to believe that one manufacturer in increasing the number of his releases has, on the whole, failed to increase his total sales. When one gets too much of a good thing a reaction takes place and the "law of diminishing returns" asserts itself.

The Triumph and the Trivial.

By Epes Winthrop Sargent.

NOT since the motion picture became the photoplay has there been released in a similar space of time more truly notable pictures than those presented the public in the past six months. It is not alone such features as the "Inferno," "A Tale of Two Cities" or "Enoch Arden," but the regular releases have been of high standard.

And at the same time in the past six months there has been turned loose upon the exchanges more imbecillic, inconsequential rot than has been unloaded since the days of the fifty-foot comedies.

The average of nine and one is only five, and it will take many Infernos to excuse some of the comedy pictures that have been made out of nothing and have lost something in the making, becoming rather less than nothing.

On the licensed side it may be argued that the increase in the number of releases without due preparation has been responsible for the appearance of so much poor material, and it would seem that some of the manufacturers are stripping their shelves of material set aside long ago because it did not measure up to standard. Indeed, there is at least one picture of recent release that was put into the discard eighteen months ago as not being worthy of publication.

But the triviality dates back to before the decision to put out five reels a day and surely the independent faction have not the same excuse, yet they have offered pictures that are as poor.

It would seem that too great a prosperity and a knowledge on both sides of the patent fence that the exchanges must take the pictures has resulted in carelessness and inferior work.

It is in the comedy end that the results have been particularly poor. It is admitted that good comedy is more difficult to write or procure than good drama, but at the same time there is to be had a better grade of product than some decrepit vaudeville joke presented without even the slight disguise of having its whiskers trimmed. Much of the stuff dates back to the before the war period when the "nigger acts" were written that still serve as the basis for many modern farces, though the farce writers have the grace to seek to disguise their plagarisms.

A rapid survey of the situation will show at least twenty-five old-time vaudeville favorites dressed over or presented in their antique garments, in the fashion of years ago, and to add to the agony there are presented many stories that are little more than episodes, single incidents strung over five hundred feet of film with nothing that even remotely approaches a plot or situation.

It is the same in the field of photodrama. The plays of last year are but slightly worked over to serve again and the producer argues that the public will never know the difference, but they do, and could the producers get a glimpse at the mail of those who answer subscribers' questions, they would soon be undeceived by the letters that ask if this play is not based on that and whether another is simply a revival or a plagarism; not that some plays will not bear revival, but these are not announced as such.

Many of the old plays would be more acceptable in revival than carelessly made revamps and there is something radically wrong with a system of booking that buries in the "commercials" the sterling successes of a year or more ago. But the fictitious demand is for novelty and the soundly constructed old play is made over in a hurry with a few disguising changes to add to the list of the trivials.

This lack of development is not confined to the resurrection of old ideas, however. It is even more plainly marked in some of the new ideas, particularly those written around some situation. A recent offering tells of a guardian uncle who fears that his niece will injure herself in the water. She is released and again goes swimming, so he moves away from the ocean. The girl looks very trim in her bathing suit and the play will appeal to those who ordinarily lament the lack of legs in the photoplays and who prefer the burlesque show to the photoplay theater, but surely this bald array of argument is not a sufficient basis for a story. A little time, a little attention to detail could have produced a well balanced and logical train of events, but a comedy was needed in a hurry and it was slapped together without care and without thought.

Roughly speaking, the sale of from twenty to twenty-five reels will return a profit on the investment, covering all overhead charges. Many of the offending dispose of double and even triple this number on the strength of made reputations. Surely a reputation such as that should be worth something to the owners of the trade mark, should be worth preserving, the more particularly when the added cost of a well planned plot would be so slight compared to the returns.

There is no use making a bid for new patrons with the triumphs when the trivials nullify the effect.

The Child and the Picture.

NOTHING can be more precious or sacred than the mind and heart of a child. Often the child's fate in later life depends on early impressions. Mankind cannot be corrupted except in the child. Never before in the history of mankind have the claims and rights of childhood been recognized more keenly, more widely and more practically than to-day. Every true friend of humanity must thrill at the thought that his day, in a greater degree than any before it, holds out a helping hand to the child.

The moving picture owes a grave duty to the child. It has more power and influence over the unformed mind than any other agency, that of the mother alone excepted.

It would be a progressive and civilizing step to have the motion picture begin its work on the child mind as soon as the latter is capable of absorbing and retaining impressions of the things which it sees.

In other words, there is no finer and more effective field for the moving picture than in the "kindergartens" of the big cities. These valuable havens for the oft-neglected and prematurely nervous child of the modern city owe their origin to a great and unselfish friend of children, who made their welfare the object of a long and useful life. If Froebel and Pestalozzi had lived long enough to get acquainted with the moving picture it would long ago be the chief factor in every "kindergarten" in the world.

We cherish a profound respect for the good women who work among the little children in the kindergartens. We believe that they would welcome the moving picture as a most valuable aid in the discharge of their duties to the little ones. Deeply impressed as we are with the importance of the moving picture as an agent in higher education, we are sure that the beginning of the work should be in the "kindergarten."

It is a matter that should draw to itself most serious consideration and we earnestly hope that some film maker will in the very near future win for himself the distinction of being the pioneer in preparing, with the aid and advice of competent teachers, pictures especially suitable for the education and training of little children.

When "Effects" Are Unnecessary Noises.

By W. Stephen Bush.

AS a friend of the moving picture and jealous of its reputation with the public, I confess I stand in fear of the average "effects man." Zeal is a most admirable quality, but in the case of the man behind the screen it needs to be tempered with judgment and discretion. As a matter of fact, such tempering of enthusiasm with common sense is rare in the extreme. While the general opinion among intelligent exhibitors holds that the effects were made for the picture, the worker behind the screen believes, that the picture was made for the effects. His desire is, above all things, to be heard, to make as much noise as possible. If the picture shows a man in the throes of death on his bed, he rises to the occasion by making the bed creak. If by any chance, a horse appears on the screen he feels in duty bound to make us believe that a troop of cavalry is riding at full gallop over a hundred blocks of macadamized pavement. At the sight of water, no matter how quiet, he at once lets go of the Niagara Falls effect.

Now effects to help the picture must be few, simple and well rehearsed for each separate and particular picture. The idea, that a set of mechanical contrivances for the production of a limited number of sounds, can be made to fit most pictures or even a small percentage of them, is utterly absurd. The moment an effect is repeated too often, it becomes monotonous, then tires one and at last is ridiculous. Each picture must be studied by itself and only such effects introduced as have a psychological bearing on the situation as depicted on the screen. The imitation of common and obvious sounds has long ago been abandoned by nine out of every ten exhibitors, who, quite wisely will rather dispense with effects altogether than risk monotonous or misplaced or ill-judged effects.

Nevertheless, it is an undoubted fact, that the introduction of suitable effects will at times help a picture immensely. There are scores of pictures that without effects are dull, insipid and meaningless and with effects, thrill, delight and please an audience. Powerful effects may be introduced with equal success in comic or dramatic pictures, even in scenic and educational subjects. At all times, effects must be original, novel, simple, quickly understood and appreciated by the audience. The proper moments for introducing them must be judged from picture to picture and no set of stereotyped rules can be laid down. The dramatic instinct, which resides in the heart of every man and woman, must be the guide and determining factor.

When once a good opportunity for a powerful effect has been discovered, the effect must be carefully rehearsed. A trained monkey can "work" the machine-made effects, but it takes a man with some intelligence to secure correctness and accuracy in original and special effects.

A few examples may help to make my meaning clearer. Let us assume, that we are dealing with a scene immediately preceding a dramatic climax. The climax depends on the coming of a certain hour. Anxiety and suspense are the dominant emotions of the central figure in the scene. At such a moment the slow and measured ticking of a clock may send a thrill or a shudder through the blood of the spectator. It is a very simple thing, an apparent trifle and yet its effect may be overpowering. The sound of musical instruments, played with a special meaning, connected with the action on the screen, may always be imitated with great advantage.

On occasions the fall of a human body or a heavy object may be indicated by proper effects back of the screen, but not every such fall is to be thus marked. Discrimination should be the saving grace of the man with the effects and if he lacks discrimination, as he often does, he should be held strictly subject to orders and given no latitude whatever. Obvious effects, such as shooting, thunder, rain, etc., are, except on rare occasions, to be omitted. The public is tired of them.

Greater license may be given to effects in comic reels, but the vulgarity, which is especially in vogue in New York, should be carefully avoided.

I conclude with a notable contrast between a proper and improper effect and select as an example two scenes from the Milano production of Dante's Inferno. No scene in that remarkable film is more impressive than the meeting of Cerberus, the three-throated monster by the poets, Dante and Virgil. "Not a limb of him, but trembled," says Dante in his masterfully descriptive way. Now, to make this mysterious monster bark like a dog in a backyard is laughable and betrays a deplorable lack of the sense of the fitting. The moment the "effect man" converts the fear-inspiring creation of Dante into a common bow-wow, every illusion is destroyed and the thin line, dividing the sublime from the ridiculous is crossed amidst the justly derisive laughter of the audience. Contrast this with an effect in the scene, where the poets enter the circle of the giants, the first of whom is Nimrod, the mighty hunter. In the poem, the sound of a horn is described, as the poets near the circle. If such an effect is introduced, if a horn is sounded, just before the title, introducing the Giants is ended, the effect is suitable and impressive, as in the next moment the huge body of Nimrod with a hunting horn around his waist, becomes visible.

There is but one general rule that may be followed with uniform advantage in the matter of effects.

To paraphrase the immortal bard: "Discrimination is the best part of strenuousness."

FLICKERS.

Canadian spectator raised a row in a Toronto picture house over a film showing how the Yanks licked the Red Coats in 1776. He got three inches in one of the local papers.

The cowboy and Indian films bid fair to soon rival the old "chase" pictures in mileage.

Some of them are more to be pitied than censored.

That rumbling sound you hear is a new automobile in 15th Street. The rumbling can be heard at the top of 80 Fifth Ave.

We notice that the Kinematograph and Lantern Weekly is running a column of "Flickers." You're welcome, K. & L. Weekly, but please don't cut authors' names off of articles and cartoons. Also occasionally give credit to the M. P. World.

While the "crime picture" is still doing yeoman service as first aid to city editors, Detroit police have given up the search for lack of clues.

Copy for a permanent announcement slide to be shown at the commencement of every moving picture show:

The fool that rocks the boat
Is the fool that yells out, "FIRE."
Who heeds his warning note
May die for the brainless LIAR.

The second story show has contributed all (2) of the moving picture disasters. What's the answer?

New York Budget exhibit is again in preparation. Moving pictures will play a more prominent part. If there had been more moving pictures last year the thing would have been more of a success. It takes a long time for city officials to realize that the people want moving pictures.

Reviews of Notable Films

"THE RED DEVILS" (Champion).

WHAT may be justly termed an adequate production is soon to be released by the Champion Company under the title, "The Red Devils." It is at once apparent that the Champion Company has spared no expense to give the subject a proper setting. Where scenic effects are employed they have the look of the real thing; the cowboys look and act like cowboys and there is an air of naturalness pervading the whole picture that is refreshing, to say the least.

The original production from which this picture was adapted was known by the title, "The Red Men," and was produced as a vaudeville sketch by Sidney Drew. In purchasing the rights to picture this sketch, the Champion secured the assistance of Mr. Drew in the work of production, all of which added to the initial cost of the picture.

The plot is a novel one to pictures and unfolds itself in logical sequence to a most satisfactory denouément. A circus comes to a frontier town and pitches its tent, attracting a good audience of cowboys, soldiers from the nearby post and residents of the town. One of the soldiers falls in love with a pretty girl performer, the daughter of the manager, and succeeds in gaining the father's consent, after which he departs for a post farther west, to which his company has been ordered. With the circus is a troup of acrobats, costumed as red devils. Just as the engagement closes, their manager receives a wire from a Western town offering him an engagement. The acrobats hail the offer with delight, especially pleased is the girl, because it will take her near her soldier lover, so the engagement is accepted.

The picture now takes us to the military post where the lover is found with his comrades about the entrance of the stockade. A messenger appears with a letter from the girl, telling him of the coming of the troup and that her father has agreed that they may be married immediately. This puts the soldier in high spirits and his comrades overwhelm him with congratulations and carry him into the stockade on their shoulders when he tells them the good news.

During these events trouble has been brewing between the cowboys and the Indians. The latter have been caught in the act of stealing cattle and, in the fight that follows, one of them, the chief's son, is killed. For this the Indians take the war path. One of the Indians happens to be in town when the stage carrying the troup of Red Devils, their manager and his daughter, starts on its journey with an escort of cowboys. This spy hastens to the camp of his tribe and the band starts out at once to prepare an ambush for the travelers.

Lumbering along over the rough trail comes the old stage coach—a real relic of pioneer days, with four horses swinging it around the curves with all the dash of the Wild West. Then a wheel breaks and the coach comes to a stop, while the occupants pile out to see what the trouble is. While they are inspecting the damage the Indians come upon them; there is a general scurrying to shelter, except one daring fellow who boldly perches himself upon the top of the coach as if he were inviting the Indians to "pot" him.

One of the cowboy escorts manages to get away at the beginning of the scrimmage with a message from the girl to her lover at the fort, which happens to be the nearest point from which succor can be obtained.

Scene from Champion's Release, "The Red Devils."

For some time the Indians continue their fire from ambush, but when all the visible defenders have been disposed of they rush the coach with the purpose of finishing them. Just as they seem about to overwhelm the survivors the troup of "Red Devils" spring out of the coach and hold the Indians spellbound in open mouthed wonder at their marvelous tumbling. While these events are happening, the messenger arrives at the fort and soon a troop of cavalry is on the way to the rescue.

Alternate views of the "Red Devils" holding the Indians in awe and the soldiers racing over the trail carry the interest to a high pitch. Now the acrobats are about exhausted from their efforts and would give up, but the girl and her father rush out and encourage them to keep going. Then one Indian, evidently not to be fooled by the antics of the "Red Devils," springs out and harangues his braves. This breaks the spell and the attack on the travelers is about to be resumed when the soldiers come dashing up and scatter the Indians. The ruse of the "Red Devils" has been successful and the scene closes with the girl clasped in the arms of her soldier lover.

The usual good quality of photography that has marked Champion pictures is noticeable in this one. There is an abundance of action and all of it with a reason, by which we mean that there is no superfluous and tedious riding hither and thither with no apparent purpose beyond that of padding the reel. Whoever put on the circus scenes knew his business; the entrances and exits are in proper order—a thing that many producers miss; there is also an absence of posing for the camera, the performers being intent upon the business laid out for them, all of which adds to the naturalness of the subject.

We predict for "The Red Devils" a long season of popularity with photoplay audiences, especially those who admire Western subjects, for it surely deserves approval.

"LITTLE DOVE'S ROMANCE" (Bison).

THERE is an imaginative quality in this picture that makes a very strong appeal. The impression that it leaves is pleasing and it is slowly cumulative. Each scene is effective as a natural part of a human story and when we have seen them all the memory has a story as a whole and not merely a broken recollection of two or three poetic pictures in a collection that has not been accepted as true of life. The poetic pictures are there, but only as integral parts of a poetic story.

The picture is a romance with an Indian, Little Dove, for its heroine. A white man comes into her life. She chances to be passing when he fires at a bird and her gun-shy horse throws her, spraining her ankle. The girl is helped by the man to his camp beside the lake, while the girl's horse, riderless, returns to the Indian village and the chief, Little Dove's father, takes up the trail with some of his braves and finds her at the camp. There's a misunderstanding, which is natural enough, and which Little Dove very quickly straightens.

The following scenes carry the story along speedily, though, as a part of it, something of Indian manners and customs is shown. This element of instructiveness is particularly pleasing in Bison Indian pictures. Many of their scenes exhibit aboriginal handicraft—porcupine quill and bead work and basketry—not merely because the property man has good specimens of this in stock, but in a way that shows a sympathetic understanding of the Indian mind. It is informing, but its presence seems solely to fill an artistic need. It gives reality to the picture.

All would have gone well at the camp and Indian village had not the white man's half-breed cook fallen passionately in love with Little Dove. She would have felt a flitting, romantic attachment for the white man that would have been forgotten when he and his hunting companions had departed from the wild lake. She would have married her right mate, a young brave of the village. But the half-breed attempts to abduct her by force and is carrying her away in his canoe when her lover sees them and in another bark canoe gives chase. The half-breed is the better paddler. He would have got away had not the two white men also seen the chase. They follow and together they overtake the half-breed, whom they wound, but who escapes, leaving Little Dove. These chase scenes are not made a feature and, while fairly strong scenes, are the lesser part of a very human story.

In what may well be termed a pretty third act, Little Dove, in a pleasing way, makes love to the white man. Her own lover is standing in the background looking on, not at all comfortable or happy, but from a sense of the fitness of things, not venturing to interfere. The white man is wise. He explains to Little Dove that it would not do for him to marry her. He and his companion then depart. Little Dove has a photograph of the white man, given to her when they first met. She draws it out. The Indian brave comes to her quietly and, taking it, tears it up while he explains to her that it would be foolish for her to keep it; that she must marry one of her own people, must marry him. She understands and seems well pleased.

The backgrounds of the story are very beautiful. It is a wild lake with clear waters which reflect the rough, wooded hills that hem it in. These hills seem grown with pines and look as though they had been burned over half a score of years previously. The camp is filled with delightful suggestions. It made this reviewer hungry to smell a fire of pine limbs with coffee and frying salmon. It's as natural as life.

"WOMAN" (Yankee).

VERY good acting, skilfully selected and staged scenes and first-class camera work are the means of putting this dramatic story over pretty effectively. Although the situation is new and modern, the character of the heroine Eleanor is up to a certain point not unlike the classic heroine Phedre. The situation, as we have pointed out, is not similar. It is a love story of modern society life. The heroine is a spoiled society girl and is engaged to a multi-millionaire. She really prefers the hero Frederick, but she, in a very well acted scene, breaks her engagement with him after his reverses in business. It would have been necessary for them to put off their engagement, for his losses have completely wiped out his fortune; but Eleanor is not that kind that will give encouragement to a poor man.

Scene from "Woman" (Yankee).

The money loss, the public shame of failure coupled with this disappointment in the woman he loves maddens him to the point of suicide, not so much from cowardice as because it is a very violent measure in a situation where violence alone seems able to suffice. Frederick is about to make an attempt on his life, but is hindered by his secretary, a young woman who secretly is in love with him. Her representations convince him that the bravest, most human thing for him to do is to fight his difficulties through to a finish. Meanwhile, Eleanor has married a nobleman.

The situation is now clearly stated and is carried forward speedily. Frederick has regained his fortune and has married his secretary, and Eleanor is unhappy with her foreign husband. She tries to recall Frederick without success. She induces him to come to her room to talk business and proposes that they run away together. He is indignant. The husband comes and she accuses Frederick of making a dishonorable proposal. The scene is well put over, and later there is a duel in which Frederick is wounded. Then there's a pretty ending with penitence and forgiveness for all. It is an effectively pictured story, though (especially the duel scene) not a picture of typical American life.

The Yankee Company is very competent and is particularly happy in producing a story such as this. All of the scenes are well photographed, most of them are pretty and one or two have poetic pictorial quality in large measure.

"UNDER ONE FLAG" (Vitagraph).

THIS forthcoming Vitagraph release is a typical illustration of civil war times from a Southern aspect. Judge Stark is a most thorough representative of the straight-backed, straight-laced, strongly prejudiced Southern gentleman. The scene opens when he and his daughter, Bettie, are bidding the judge's son, Capt. Stark, good-bye as he starts for the front; all are evidently animated by but one thought—that of the certain defeat of their opponents.

It is a sad blow to the Judge when he receives a newspaper relating the capture and imprisonment of his son; his Southern temper is displayed with marvelous vigor; his pride has received a serious setback, and although he would fain annihilate everyone himself, so great is his blending of pride, anger and defiance, circumstances compel him to accept the humiliation and bow to the inevitable. Soon after this, Bettie is walking through a neighboring glen when she finds a Union soldier lying wounded upon the rocks. As he appeals to her for help she is glad to have an opportunity to show her Southern antipathy and scorn him.

Human impulses, however, are stronger than strivings, and she decides to help him. By her aid he is able to crawl into a nearby cave where he will be safe from capture and where Bettie has now determined to nourish him. Taking old "Mose," the colored man, into her confidence, she sends him with bedding while she procures food, and together they make Capt. Meyers comfortable. It being announced in the papers that General Sherman is to pass that way with troops, Meyers writes a note to the general telling of his whereabouts. This note old "Mose" is afraid to deliver. On his knees he begs Bettie to relieve him of what to him is such a hard and dangerous task. Indignant at his weakness, Bettie delivers the note herself and is given a company of soldiers, whom she leads to the cave, from where Capt Meyers is safely carried away. In saying good-bye to Bettie, he promises to see what he can do for her brother, and she gives him her locket as a token.
